IN GERMANY.
SOME NOTES OF EUROPEAN TRAVEL.
 Mr. Hensel Crossed to Germany and Describes the Countries Passed Through, the Cities Visited and Novel Sights Encountered. Extracts from Private Correspondence.
 BONS, Germany, July 17, 1884. We left London on Monday morning at 7:30 for Brussels via Dover and Ostend. The country between London and Dover is rich in agricultural productions; more so than any part of England we have seen. Different things appear to have raised in this section for the London market. We pass through the town of Rochester, 33 miles from London; Gads Hill, celebrated for Falstaff's encounter with the men in Buckram is three miles from Rochester, and was the residence of Dickens. We also pass through Canterbury, once the stronghold of the "Kentishmen," and now the metropolitan see of the whole land. The cathedral has quite a history, dated back to the 11th century. We reach Dover at 4 o'clock, distance from London 77 miles. There is little of interest here; the ancient castle stands high above the chalk cliffs and in its walls, it is said, may be seen remains of Roman and Saxon work.
 Quick passage over smooth seas.
 We take passage in one of the Belgian Royal mail steamers for Ostend, distance 68 miles, and make the passage in about four hours, over a calm and smooth sea, although in stormy weather it often takes from eight to ten hours. Here again I did not experience any of the usual seasickness of which I have heard so much, and am beginning to think I am a pretty good sailor.
 Upon arriving at Ostend our baggage is all in a room and I examine it. No dynamite or other dangerous stuff is discovered, we pass on to Brussels, the Paris of the North.
A Marvel of Cultivation.
 The appearance of the country is now different from that of the Mediterranean. It is almost a dead level; there are a few fences, except here and there a hedge along the railroad. I never saw anything so rich in agricultural productions, and every acre under cultivation, not in large fields, but in small patches. The land is low, and drained by ditches; the productions are wheat, rye, oats, potato, turnips, sugar beets, and all kinds of garden vegetables; their farming is all done without the aid of machinery. There are no large cities, and the houses are all one story. We see hundreds of windmills in the fields; the houses or outages are all one story with red tile roofs. There is very little timber. Except the double rows of trees which line all the public roads, a species of poplar is raised and by means of it, with Belgian hares. We pass through Bruges and Ghent, both large towns; the latter is 14 miles from Ostend. It has an old cathedral one of its churches (Notre Dame) has a spire 41 feet high. The belfry of Bruges is 329 feet high and has a chime of 48 bells, among the best in Europe, and they play every quarter of an hour. Ghent, too, has its cathedral, its old belfry, its spire, of which we saw and heard so much in the country.
 In Brussels.
 We reach Brussels at 6:30 p. m., and take quarters at the Grand Hotel Belgique, which is an elegantly kept house, where the wants of parents are looked after in manner that is refreshing after a long journey. The buildings appear to be principally brick, plastered outside and painted white. The Palace of Justice, just about being completed, is one of the finest buildings in Europe. The king's palace, and gardens are close to our hotel. A large park with fountains, splendid lake, shady avenues, where free concerts are given every evening. But one of the finest things I have seen is the lovely boulevard "Waterloo," which runs through the city. It is lined with stately buildings, with a roadway for horseback riders, and the promenades for pedestrians. The population of the city is 400,000.
 We take the train here on Tuesday morning for Aix-la-Chapelle, distance 105 miles, passing through more rolling country after leaving Brussels, and where there appear to be large manufactures of iron. We go through the cities of Louvain, Leige, Buevotte and Verriers. Having crossed into Germany our baggage is removed to be examined. But a custom-house official puts his hand to the cars and merely asks in German: "Have you anything to sell?" to which we respond, "No."
 At Leige we crossed the Meuse, a grander stream on a very fine bridge; this city has a population of over 100,000. The ride from Verriers to Aix-la-Chapelle is through a district remarkable for picturesque scenery. We lie over at Aix-la-Chapelle, a city of 100,000 people. The Cathedral and Rathaus or hotel de ville. This place was once a Roman station; it was the birthplace and favorite residence of Charlemagne, and here, for many centuries after his death, all the German emperors were crowned. Little more remains of its former magnificence, except its Cathedral and Rathaus, which are of great interest to tourists. Of the former only the nave was built by Charlemagne, A. D. 768-804; it is an octagon surrounded by a gallery a sufferer severely at the hands of the Normans in the ninth century, but was repaired by Otto III, at the close of the tenth century. The tomb of Charlemagne is in this part of the church, bearing the inscription, "Carlo Magno." It was opened by Otto at the time of the repairs, and the dead emperor was found seated in state on a marble throne. This throne was afterwards used for crowning the German emperors, and it is shown to visitors. The pulpit, is of silver, and adorned with carved ivory and jewels, was presented by Henry II. Some silk tapestry with scriptural scenes woven in the cloth, although many hundred years old, is in a good state of preservation.
 There are a number of sacred relics, which are only shown once in every seven years. We were shown a marble sarcophagus, which was brought from Rome, in which Augustus, the first Roman emperor was buried. It is a fine work of art, having raised figures on the sides. When the remains of Charlemagne were found in the tomb as above described, but what yet remains of this sacred place is among the most interesting. It is a chief point of interest here. It is a chaste work of art. The style is Gothic, and next to that at Milan is regarded as one of the finest in the world. It was commenced in 1215, and after passing through many vicissitudes has been nearly completed. It has been described by able pens, and I shall not attempt it, only to say from the guide books, that it is 445 feet long and 140 broad. The nave, the transept, and the choir is 149 feet high; the magnificent south portal 224 feet high; cost over half a million dollars. The stained glass in the windows is very beautiful.

 The fresh and vegetable markets were objects of interest to me, less than the dog milk carts. It is a novel sight to see these dogs driven by women who serve milk through the city. They are all muzzled, and when the cart stops they lie down to rest.
 There are a number of old churches here which we do not visit, as we are anxious to go on to Bonn in the morning. From this point we will take a steamer and ascend the Rhine to Mayence.
