AT A PARSEE FUNERAL.

SCENES GIVEN TO THE VILLAGERS.

The horrible disposition of the dead by the Parsees is a subject that has long been a subject of interest to the public. To-day, following the natural sequence of services in the prayer-book, I went to see a Parsee funeral. The scene was a long stretch of water known as Back Bay. The situation is one of the most favored in the neighborhood of the city, and the hill is dotted with the houses of European residents who do not much like the vicinity of the awesome towers. But the Parsees were here first, and it cannot be said that either their burial-place or their funeral service is obtrusive. From the road below, the towers are visible, and only a vague shadow of the towers, and the salubrious air reminds one of their propinquity. There are five towers in all made from a common material. They are twenty-five feet high, the diameter being seven-and-a-half feet. Within the tower is a large platform marked out in three divisions. Within the outer ring are placed the corpses of men; women are laid in grooves formed in the second circle and children in the third. With the exception of the top, always open to the heavens, there is only one opening to the tower. This is by a doorway made in the thick walls, through which the corpse bearers enter and deposit the naked body in its appointed place. As soon as they retire theParsees who have been waiting for their moment, impatient of the scant remonies that precede its setting forth, sweep down and begin their work. No human eye has beheld the ghastly spectacle. The silence and the solitude of the towers are broken only by the presence and the hollow whistle of the bird of prey. But it is known that within half an hour of the body's being laid out in the tower, nothing is left but the skeleton. Eight days later, by which time the bones are thoroughly dried, the corpse bearers return and take up the relics and cast them in a well in the centre of the tower, where in process of years they become decomposed, and absolutely nothing is left of what was once man or woman. For 200 years the Parsees, living together in Bombay, have followed their last resting place, their dust mingling in a common tomb, undivided in death as they were united in life. Yet in all these years it has not been found necessary to clear out the wells by reason of overcrowding. It is customary for a man or woman to be buried in the particular tower where those of their own family, traced back in many cases for two centuries, have been given to the villagers.

A Parsee's Fear of Earth Burial.

One tower is set apart for special purposes, and is least frequented. Here are buried members of the Parsee sect who have been guilty of heinous crimes or in some way become outcasts from their race. It would be shocking that a Parsee should be buried in a criminal's grave, and the time of Cyrus; but the bones of honest men and women may not be contaminated by mixture with his. In a temple commanding the view of the sacred fire, in 200 years ago, is still kept burning, and is mathematically set, so that the light may shine through an aperture in each of the towers.

We had the advantage of having the place and the mode of funeral explained by the secretary, a genial person in spectacles, white gown and bright red trousers, who spoke excellent English. He explained that the Parsee regarded cremation as a preferable means of disposing of dead bodies. But they worshiped fire, and could not set for their deity the performance of this last office. Whilst admitting that the process was naturally revolting to the Western mind, he powerfully justified it as the means of saving the earth from pollution by the absorption of matter from dead bodies that in connection with the well containing the decomposed bones they have an elaborate system of drainage which carries off whatever may have direct to the sea. Whatever else may be said of the system it is certainly cheap, five rupees covering funeral costs.

As we stood in the grounds a funeral came by. In accordance with custom the services commenced at the house of the deceased, when friends and relations had gathered and prayer had been said. It is enjoined by the Parsee ritual that whatever the intervening distance may be, the body must be carried on the shoulders of men from the bed to the tower. They carried it as a swinging pace, four men bearing the body on a light bier, shoulder high. The body was simply covered from head to foot with a white cloth. All the mourners were dressed in white, and those not carrying the body walked in front. Each couple holding a handkerchief between them. I asked the secretary what was the significance of this, but he did not know, could only surmise, in no very clear way that it was "a fortification against impurity." It was ordained by Zoroaster and his disciples that man, if not sufficient for a mild flesh to the inquiry. Before the procession walked an old man leading a white dog with curly tail and not in the best condition. I thought he had caught the mongrel trespassing within the cemetery. "A dog leading to the gate with intent ignominiously to thrust it forth. But I learned that the dog was an indispensable figure in the funeral. Scarcely less so than the corpse itself. When the bearers brought the body to the foot of the tower, on the topmost edge of which theParsee sat, a black foreboding dog, the cloth was removed from the head, the dog brought up and effort made to cause him to look into the dead face. This done, the corpse bearers took up the body and disengaged it from the trap door and the dog was led away. Here again, except that he was ordained in the ritual and had been practiced for thousands of years, my philosopher and friend in the boggy red trousers was at a loss for explanation. "A dog holds," he said, whilst warning me against accepting it as anything but a surmise, "that the dog's eyes have the power of attracting to themselves all impurity." In well regulated households the dog is brought in to look upon the face of every man or woman before any act of ceremony, just as in another church extreme unction is administered. As the dying eyes of the pious Catholic look last upon the cross, so ere earthly things fade for ever from his closing eyes the Parsee looks on the face of a dog. The dog must be white in color, and to be perfect should be marked with yellow spots, a rare phenomenon reserved for the betterment of the eternal chances of the rich. We saw the dog of one back, and no longer wondered at the melancholy aspect. What a life it must add! To be taken out at frequent intervals expecting that it is going for a saunter through the fields, or peradventure to be led forth to a bountiful meal, and always to be brought up short to see the cloth uncovered, to think that perhaps after all here is the meal, and once again

THE GREENLY EXPEDITION.

An Official Report Concerning the Bodies of the Late Wm. Greely.

The secretary of the navy and the secretary of war having been in consultation at the navy yard, Brooklyn, with Commander Schley concerning the Greely expedition, from them the following reliable statement relative to the recent reports of the treatment of the bodies of the dead of the Greely party expedition is derived:

"From the revelations made by the examining of some of the bodies infereces have been drawn that insensations had been made in all the bodies and that portions of the flesh had been used either for food or for bait for catching shrimps. The following authentic extract from Commander Schley's report, now being prepared for the secretary of the navy, shows a portion of the remains to have been so treated, but that those of Lieutenant Lockwood, Sergeant Israel, Sergeant Linn, Private Schneider, Sergeant Cross and the Eskimo Christianson were absolutely whole and untouched.

"In preparing the bodies of the dead for transportation in alcohol to St. John's, it was found that the bodies of six of them—Lieutenant Kishlingbury, Sergeant Jewell, Private Whistler, Private Henry, Private Ellis and Sergeant Halston—had been cut, and the fleshy parts remained to a greater or less extent. All the other bodies were intact."

Every person to be a great success in this life must have a speciality; that is, must concentrate the abilities of body and mind on some one pursuit. Burdock Blood Purifier has their speciality, as well as for those of a milder type. It never fails to affect the system, and by its use you will have recognized it speak of it in some high terms.
