THE NOVEL RIGHTS OF ITS CAPITAL.

Travelling Through Paris and Viewing Historic Places—Routes of the Great Home.

Extracts from Private Correspondence.

PARIS, Aug. 24, 1884.—We left Berlin on Monday morning for Basle, distant about 80 miles, via Offen. The road for some distance was through a good farming country, but after we strike the Rhine it becomes more broken and hilly. We arrive at Basle at 1 o'clock p. m., and stop at the Hotel Troya (the king's), which we find to be a good hotel and situated immediately on the Rhine, which is quite a large stream up here, almost as wide as it is at Cologne; and is spanned by several bridges, the river dividing the town into two parts.

The town is old, the streets irregular and narrow, and it has the reputation of churches which we find all over Europe. There is a mission house here which has sent out a number of ministers of the Reformation, among them Rev. J. Gantenbein, the pioneer of the mission work of the Reformed church in Portland, Oregon, where he is still successfully laboring.

We left Basle on Tuesday morning for Paris at 8:45 by express in distance 934 miles. Here we regretfully parted company with Dr. Baseman and wife, who contemplate spending some time in Southern Germany, and will not sail until September 10th.

Nothing of particular interest occurred on our journey. We pass through Mulhouse, and soon reach the French frontier, where they go through the form only of examining our baggage. We pass through a number of towns of no particular note the largest of which is Troyes.

The Country Along the Rhine. After leaving the Rhine the country is level, and does not present any particularly striking features. Their principal crop appears to be oats, which was being raised in the same primitive mode of farming which is still to be seen on the continent so far as our observation goes. They have an occasional steam threshing machine, but no reaping or mowing machines, but horse rakes, but they do use grain cradles. Instead of cutting and binding the grain, they use the reaping machine, they throw the swath towards it. Their plow would make our Lancaster county farmers smile. It is an awkwardly constructed affair with two wheels in front upon which the beam rests at about an angle of 45 degrees, and their plowing is what we call scratching the ground. The part of France through which we passed was not as fertile as we expected to find it. The soil appeared thin in many places.

Before approaching Paris the land is more fertile, and we see through miles of vineyards and orchards. We reach the city about 7 o'clock and take quarters at the Hotel Lundy and New York Hotel, the latter, which is a very central location. The hotel is quiet and unpretentious, but is well kept, has a large contingent of English and American guests, and has moderate charges.

In Paris. And now, what shall we say of Paris? So much has already been said on this subject, that any attempt to describe it upon our part would, we fear, sound commonplace, we shall therefore confine ourselves to what comes under our own observation, without any attempt at embellishment.

It is pretty difficult for a stranger in Paris, and particularly with one not understanding the French language, to get along without a guide, until he becomes acquainted with the localities at least. We found it so, and we secured one, an Abbe, who spoke English, French and German. He proved a valuable assistant to us, and we retained him for the first two days.

We first go through the Rue Royale, Madeleine, and through the Place de la Concorde, the finest place in Paris, and indeed in Europe. It is situated between the Tuilleries and the Champs Elysees, where stands the obelisk of Luxor. From which we see the Arc de Triomphe, the Corps Legislatif, or House of Commons, and many other fine buildings. On the spot where the obelisk stands, the guillotine was erected during the reign of Louis XV. Louis XVI, and Marie Antoinette were the first victims, and upwards of 2,000 persons were re-decapitated between January of that year and May 1795.

The gardens of the Tuilleries are large and beautiful, and were now purchased by the Commune in 1871, and has not been restored. The Louvre is of vast extent, and rich in architectural beauty, but the art treasures it holds are of priceless value. To speak of its picture galleries and statues, would only be repeating what we have already written of the great art treasures of the other old European cities visited.

The Palace Royale was also partly destroyed in 1871, but has been restored again, and is full of elegant shops around the court yard.

The palace of Luxembourg was built over 200 years ago. It has been prison and senate house by turns. It has a remarkably fine gallery of sculpture and paintings, rich in masterpieces of the art. The present senate chamber is in this palace. It is a very handsome room richly furnished, with comfortable and well arranged seats for the members, something after the plan of the senate chamber at Washington. There are a number of other very furnished rooms containing much of the valuable furniture, removed from the Tuilleries at the time of its destruction.

We stood in the window in which King Charles IX, then a very young man, stood, and at the instigation of his mother Catherine de Medici, fired at the fleeing Huguenots, after the signal had been given by sounding the bell of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, which stands near the palace, for the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

The Hotel de Ville is a building of great historical interest, but was entirely destroyed by the Commune in 1871, but has been rebuilt and is now nearly completed. It is of great architectural beauty, and we are informed, very much like the one destroyed.

We visit the church of La Sorbonne, in which is the tomb of Blaise Pascal, the great mathematician, whose red hat is suspended over his tomb. The Pantheon, once a temple of fame, now a church, is modeled after the Pantheon of Rome, with a fine portico, sculptured Corinthian columns, but having a dome.

The Palace of Justice in which the courts are held is a very fine building. The court rooms, halls and ante chambers are much superior to those of the temple in London. We were favorably impressed by both bench and bar. The judges wear gowns and caps of a peculiar shape trimmed with bands of gold lace. The lawyers also wear caps and gowns, which they always change before leaving the building in a room kept for that purpose. The Palais de Justice, east of the Hotel de la Tuilleries contains the Arch de Triomphe, modeled after that of Severus at Rome, with statues of soldiers of the First Empire, and on the top a group of four bronze horses and chariots driven by a female figure. It was erected on our first day's sight seeing in Paris.

Before starting for Versailles on Wednesday morning, we visit the Madeleine or St. Mary Magdalene church. It is a superb edifice standing in a very prominent position at the head of the Rue Royale, and near the Place de la Concorde. It was unfinished when the revolution broke out, and was only completed in 1842 at a total cost of over two and a half million dollars. It has a row of Grecian columns all around the sides and porticos. The carvings in front represent the last judgment, and the bronze doors are adorned with groups representing the Ten Commandments.

During the civil war which succeeded the siege of Paris, the Madeleine was in great danger. A barricade, defended by cannon and mitrailleurs, was erected in front of it by the communists, over the Rue Royale, and in the conflict many houses were buried down and others injured. When the army of the republic was successful, several hundred insurgents sought sanctuary in the Madeleine, but were followed and killed on the spot.

OFF to Versailles. We start for Versailles at 9:30 a. m., by rail, distant 14 miles, through the suburbs of Paris, the Madeleine was in great danger. A barricade, defended by cannon and mitrailleurs, was erected in front of it by the communists, over the Rue Royale, and in the conflict many houses were buried down and others injured. When the army of the republic was successful, several hundred insurgents sought sanctuary in the Madeleine, but were followed and killed on the spot.

The state apartments, now only kept for show, are magnificently furnished. The furniture and ornaments being of the time of Louis XIV. The red bed room furniture used by Marie Antoinette, remain as they were in her time, as well as those of Josephine the first wife of Napoleon I. In the great dining hall in which Napoleon II entertained his guests on the 15th of Europe, stand two Sevres vases which cost $10,000 each. The great Tribune in the same hall; it was built by Louis XIV, for one of his mistresses, and while in comparison with the palace, is exquisitely furnished and adorned, and both are interesting for their historical associations. The coach house near the great Tribune contains a curious display of coaches belonging to the kings of France and costly character, which were used on state occasions by Charles X and the Napoleons, but which republican France has no longer any use for. But the French are a fickle people, some of them having given their simple form of government, which is too tame for them; and should they change their government again, which is not at all improbable, these cast off emblems of monarchy will be handy.

Bellevue or the forest.

There are many other places of interest we have visited, such as the hotel des Invalides, the magnificent tomb of the first Napoleon; the public library with its two million volumes, containing manuscript letters of Voltaire, Rousseau, Montesquieu and others; the statues of Liberty and Republic, the Bartholdi statue of liberty for New York harbor, to the top of which we ascended inside; the cemetery Pere la Chaise, where sleep their last sleep such eminent statesmen as Cassimere Perier, president of the council of ministers under Louis Philippe, Ledru Rollin, a member of the republican government of 1848; M. Thiers, late president of the republic. Rachel the great actress, the Rothschilds and of Abelard and Heloise concerning whose romantic love, many of your readers are familiar, the Camp de Versailles, over the great Boulevards, to the Champs Elysees, past the Arc de Triomphe to Notre Dame whose history is almost co-existent with that of France. The lovely little chapel of the 13th century built by the pious Louis, and the morgue with its ghastly dead, of the elegant stores and shops, the gaiety and fashion of Paris, the details of which would only weary the reader.

It is the Sabbath while we write which is day of rest with us, but not so here. Carpenters, masons, bricklayers and printers are busy at work; the shops, cafes and places of business are nearly all open; omnibuses, tramway cars and a constant running everywhere, keeping up such a din as to almost deafen you, while the streets are filled with people bent on business or pleasure. Such is life in Paris.

We leave here for London in the morning in a Pullman Coaches, expecting to stay in this city a day or two, visiting Stratford-on-Avon, Warwick and Kenilworth, and get to Liverpool so as to sail in the Aurania on next Saturday, 30th inst.

BAFFLED.

One of the Most Unaccountable and Dangerous of Recent Diseases Discovered and Exposed.

There is some mysterious trouble that is attacking nearly every one in the land with more or less violence. It seems to steal into the body like a thief in the night. Doctors cannot diagnose it. Scientists are puzzled by its symptoms. It is indeed, a modern mystery. Like those severe and vague maladies that attack horses and prostrate nearly all the animals in the land, this trouble seems to menace mankind. Many of its victims have pains in the chest and sides, and sometimes in the back. They feel dull and heavy, the mouth has a bad taste, especially in the morning. A strange stinging or itching about the teeth. The appetite is poor. There is a feeling like a heavy load upon the stomach; sometimes faint, all some sensation is felt at the pit of the stomach, which food does not satisfy. The eyes grow sunken, the hair, which has not fallen out at one time and tula, thereby at others. After a while a cough sets in, at first dry, but after a few months it is attended with a grayish colored expectoration. The afflicted one feels tired all the while and sleep does not seem to afford any rest. He becomes nervous, irritable and gloomy, and has evil forebodings. There are bright flashes, a peculiar whirling sensation in the head when lying up suddenly. The bowels become constipated and then again relax. At times he has a chill and hot at times; the blood grows thick and stagnant; the whites of the eyes become tinged with yellow, the urine is scanty and rich colored, depositing a sediment after standing. There is frequently a swelling up of the feet, sometimes with a swelling of the skin. The patient has a sweetish taste; this is often attended with a peculiar odor of the breath, and the patient becomes impaired, with spots before the eyes; there is a feeling of prostration and great weakness. Most of these symptoms are in turn present. It is thought that nearly one-third of our population have this ailment either in some of its worst stages, while medical men have almost wholly mistaken its nature; and some have treated it for one disease, and some for another, but nearly all have failed to reach the seat of the disorder. Indeed, many physicians are afflicted with it themselves. The experience of Dr. A. C. Yates, residing at No. 457 Tremont street, Boston, is thus described by himself.

I had all those peculiar and painful symptoms which attend this disease, and which you know all too commonly established, and even without my having tried any medicine. I had been in the past, I therefore determined to strike out in a new path. To my intense satisfaction I found that I was being cured. The dull, stupid feeling departed, and I began to enjoy life again. My appetite returned, my sleep was refreshing, the color of my face which had been a sallow yellow gradually assumed its natural color. My system improved, and I felt like a new man. I know that it was wholly owing to the wonderful efficiency of Warner's Peppermint Cure, which I used in strict accordance with the directions. I feel that I am cured, and I am sure that my cure will be permanent. I feel that I am cured, and I am sure that my cure will be permanent. I feel that I am cured, and I am sure that my cure will be permanent.
