The Different Kinds of Manures to be Used in Agriculture—A Collection of Agricultural Statistics from the Census of 1880—J. B. Rogers' Horticultural Farm and Station.

Manures are naturally divided into two great classes, generally known as barnyard or stable manure, and commercial fertilizers.

Stable manure is the safest for those to use who have but little experience. It is a complete manure, its nature exactly being adapted to the soil for fruits it should be well rotted, cutting in the heap something like cheese.

A compost of the several kinds of barnyard manure is better than any one separately. Another of the best manures is the compost exactly as it is obtained, yet often used as such is the bottom of old wood piles, called "chip manure."

When used as it is well decayed, and be sure that no white mould is in it, as wherever this is found, should it come in contact with the roots of trees or plants, great injury is done by it. Wood's earth is another safe, and at the same time very efficacious manure.

When, however, the finest, largest, most perfect fruit is sought, recourse must be had to the commercial fertilizers. In the use of these, as they are all so called specials (each having certain definite functions or uses when mixed in the ground or compost heap), a knowledge of the action of the several substances used in plant growth is important.

The two essential fertilizers needed by most fruits are ground bone and potash. The ripening of fruit can be hastened by the application of phosphoric acid, but if applied too abundantly it seems to ripen the fruit prematurely, making it of small size.

Every one engaged in raising fruit, itself more profitably, with a better color, richer flavor and increased size. All things considered, the muriate is the safest form in which potash can be used, and of the highest grades. In the use of bone ash or phosphate, there are three good agricultural forces at work, yet capable, when in union in proper proportions, of making a complete whole, resulting in the finest fruit.

These proportions each cultivator must ascertain by experiment for himself. Too much will tend to over-ripening, and early ripening of wood; too much potash, late growth and ripening of wood and fruit.

Science informs us what part each ingredient of the compost best works in the ground, and the knowledge of which is best obtained at the heart's ease in winter. Practical experience is gained by experiments conducted in the soil on the farm; the resulting benefits of the two are increased property in the nation. The manure press is in the press is to awaken interest in the three.

AGRICULTURAL ITEMS.

A Maine farmer says his experience has convinced him that ten good grade Merino sheep can be kept on the same feed that would keep one cow—and are more profitable.

The present sows from crushing their young all a board about one foot wide to the side of the pen. The board is to be put on like a shelf, so that the little pigs can run under it to get out of the way.

An ox will consume two per cent. of his weight of hay per day to maintain his condition. It is better to moderate labor, as increase of this quantity to three per cent. will enable him to perform his work and maintain his flesh. He is to be fattened, he requires about four and a half per cent. of his weight daily in nutritious food.

Every month in a harvest season for some section of the world, though the harvest does not always consist of hay or grain. There is a fruit harvest as well as a hay harvest, and harvests also of other products.

Every forest land had better be kept in woods until the rest of the farm is in the highest possible state of cultivation. There are millions of poor land partly cultivated that ought never have been cleared off. But when farmers have such land, they should be made to make it valuable if anything can. Also, think of the dogs, and have them exterminated, as far as possible.

In 1879 the average of the winter wheat crop was 13 1/2 bushels per acre. With the present season it will yield a total of 518,000,000 bushels. Last year it was 420,000,000. The corn crop was 1,551,000,000 bushels. This country does not use so many roots for stock as European countries do in view of the ease with which it grows Indian corn.

STORY OF A FANSAVAL.

Two young women drop their handkerchiefs in a ferry passage.

From the New York Sun.

The following advertisement was printed on Sunday last in a morning newspaper:

PERSONAL.—YES OR NO. MONDAY morning, 11 o'clock sharp. De-boscé will call on the young man at the office. Signal by dropping handkerchief.

There are two waiting rooms on the New York side of the D. S. street street ferry. They are connected by a passage, on one side of which the ticket seller takes care of a few minutes before 11 o'clock the occupants of the outer room are a pretty young woman in a gypsy hat on one side of the room, and a fat German with a gun and a dog on the other side.

Fifty soon two well-dressed young men pushed open the door, stood and stared at the young woman, and finally sat down and kept their eyes on her while they pretended to read the morning newspapers.

Other young men went through the same performance.

At 11 o'clock there was a row of men starting at the girl, and she began to be nervous, she pulled out a dainty lace handkerchief and passed it rapidly over her face. It slipped from her grasp and fell to the floor. The young man dropped his newspaper into their laps and focused their eyes across the room.

The girl grew red in the face, and it was redder after she had stooped and recovered her handkerchief. Then she glanced indignantly at the young man across the room, gathered up three bundles, and went out into the open air. The young man bounced to their feet and flattened their noses against the transparent window panes in the doors that swung to behind her.

If the young men had turned around at that instant and looked through the passageway into the inner room, they would have seen another young woman drop a handkerchief as a middle-aged man with a plug hat paid his ferry fare and passed inside, and they would have seen the two young men on the ferry boat together and sailing away.

Ten minutes afterward a handsome, gray-haired man joined the young woman outside of the ferry house and talked with her a moment. Then they entered the ferry house, and the gray-haired man stood at the young woman's feet and absorbed in their newspapers that they did not see him. The girl called the gray-haired man papa as he was buying tickets to Newark, and as they passed out of sight he was passing the young woman.

She was gazing at him in a sleep-like way, and one by one found their feet as they went out.

The Housewife.

If there is cream, and sweet acids, and any of the above, and the children feel good for nothing, there is not a very happy mother. The child's health, the mother's health, or the father's health, will account for all this. Try on all be cast out by the use of the iron bits of the great Tonic and strengthener. Health brings happiness. Mrs. Rochester, 85 North 3d street, Baltimore, says: "I have seen every other remedy, but I have not seen one that has done me good."

Words of Warning and Comfort.

"I am suffering from poor health or long illness on a bed of sickness, take these little iron bits. They will make you feel weak and dispirited, without clearly knowing why. Hop Bitters will surely cure you."

If you are a minister and have overtaxed your mind with your pastoral duties, or a mother who has toiled in the care and work of a man of business or labor, weakened by the strain of your everyday duties, or a man whose health is being ruined by the use of Hop Bitters, will surely strengthen you."
