LANCASTER, MARCH 10, 1885.

Teller's Backbone.

Senator Teller, in the Senate, boldly defends his action as secretary of the interior in issuing the land grants of the "Backbone" railway. This was an ancient grant by Congress to a road which was never built or even surveyed, but which executed an assignment of the grant to another road which has been built. It seems quite clear that it was a scheme to transfer the unearned land grant of an unbuilt road, which had this grant as its only asset, to a company which built a railroad upon an entirely different line, in a different direction and between different points from those contemplated in the original grant.

Senator Van Wyck, of Nebraska, has called the attention of the Senate to this thing, and offered a resolution of inquiry into the apparent crookedness. Secretary Teller comes up smiling in declared confidence that everything he has done in the matter is as "straight as a string," and boldly takes the bull by the horns in declaring that the land grant was one fit to be issued and he did no more nor less than his duty in issuing the patent. Intrepidity is a good thing in a good cause, and often counts powerfully in a bad one. It is anyhow more creditable to be a bold than a timid rascal.

Secretary and Senator Teller is one of the bold kind. He evidently did deliberately what he did in regard to this grant and is ready to be slain if it has any slaying power. His defense is simple. He admits that the railroad was not built by the original company within the time limited in the act giving the land grant; but neither, he says, were other railroads, that have received land grants, built within the time limited.

As to his issuing the patent at the end of his term of office, he says that he waited patiently for Congress to act upon the proposition before it to forfeit the grant; and that he only determined to issue the patent when the forfeiture bill failed in the House.

Manifestly Mr. Teller's answers though simple, are not sufficient. He fails to explain why it was his duty to issue a patent for a land grant that Congress had a right to forfeit for failure of its conditions, before he received the instruction of Congress to issue it. He had received full notice that there was strong objection in Congress to the granting of this land, and there was certainly nothing in the law which required him to issue the patent, Congress objecting. The fact that the road had not been built in the time limited was sufficient to excuse him from action until Congress had declared its intention to confirm the grant; and not only excused but required him to refrain from action. It matters not at all that other grants to other railroads may have been issued to them after the time limited for building the roads had expired. That wrong would not justify another. This one was perpetrated deliberately by Secretary Teller, with knowledge that Congress contemplated cancelling the grant.

And the haste with which he pressed the preparation of the papers to his office before his term expired testified that he was not willing to leave the propriety of their issue to the judgment of his successor. He was so sure he was right, or so determined for some other reason, that he would not withhold his hand from the deed, though the 4th of March was at hand to relieve him of responsibility. Evidently there was nothing left for Senator Teller but to maintain the virtue and wisdom of an act of which he so eagerly sought the responsibility that he kept his clerks working day and night and Sundays to complete it within his term of office.

A Forgotten Oath.

The representatives of the local millers, grain dealers and shippers represent to the members of the legislature from Lancaster county that there has been discrimination in freight rates practiced by the railroads, and that this is contrary to the fundamental law of the commonwealth. The members of the general assembly from Lancaster county will no doubt be startled to hear this. They probably never suspected it. They may not even be ready to believe it.

We beg to remind them—notwithstanding they ride on free passes—that the constitution not only forbids such discrimination, but it declares that the general assembly shall enforce its provisions "by appropriate legislation;" and that they and each of them have solemnly sworn to support that constitution.

Have they forgotten their oath? Is it not moral perjury to omit or neglect to enforce this provision of the constitution? There is at least an easy way to do it, about which there can be no dispute, the way proposed by Mr. Wallace to enact the provisions of the constitution as part of the statute law and add penalties for every violation of it.

What do the Lancaster county members say to this? Are Messrs. Mylin, Stehman, Davis, Brosius, Heidelberg, Book, Courtney and Kemper for it or against it? If for it, what are they doing to accomplish it? Lancaster county suffers its share from freight discriminations.

Well Done, Mr. Bayard.

If the report turn out to be true that Mr. Bayard has tendered the office of first assistant secretary of state to Mr. John Cadwalader, of Philadelphia, he has made a most happy selection. He is a son of the late Judge John Cadwalader and nephew of Gen. Geo. R. Cadwalader, deceased. He is a lawyer, a scholar, a gentleman and a Democrat of the school of his fathers. He is the possessor of a large estate and the trustee of extensive and important interests for others which he has managed with fidelity and care.

He is president of the Young Men's Democratic association and has been a candidate for Congress in one of the Philadelphia districts. His counsel and his aid have never been lacking his party.

He is clean and clear cut; he has ability, courage and modesty. It may be assumed that he has sought no place, invented no booms and started out no boomers to secure it for himself. But if it comes to him, it comes worthily; he has the social graces and intellectual accomplishments to adorn it.

Well done, Mr. Bayard.

The ornamental head of the agricultural bureau, Commissioner Loring, will die harder than most of his associates.

AND NOW Dr. Burchard has been retired from his ministerial duties at the Murray Hill church, New York, because a younger pastor is needed. The work was done by the New York presbytery and the old man, whose famous alliterative remark at the Blaine banquet is known to two continents, was present, but said nothing. It would be interesting to know whether Burchard now believes in the adage "silence is golden."

COATESVILLE has a peanut war that has forced down the price of this precious nourishment to two cents a quart. Coatesville may expect a large share of rural immigration.

A SHAVED FIG, well groomed, is let loose in Pittsburgh skating rinks, and the small boy on rollers given an opportunity to catch it; which ludicrous scene of the pursued and pursuer in their various movements is greatly enjoyed by the spectator. An enterprising manager of the Smoky City, observing the popularity of the feature there, bought and introduced a hog into his rink in Massillon, Ohio. This special attraction lasted but one night, the superintendent of the humane society having the manager arraigned on a charge of cruelty to animals before a justice, who required him to pay a fine and costs amounting to $15. If it is the desire to really prevent cruelty to animals, an agent of some humane society should visit New York when the next roller skating match takes place in Madison Square garden. From all accounts several of the participants were more dead than alive when the last race was finished.

IT IS A cold day when Russia does not get her finger into the continental pie.

THE INTELLIGENCER has been publishing some sprightly sketches of fox-hunting in the vicinity of the Lancaster county. They seem to have excited the admiration of the New York Sun, which alters one of them slightly and prints it as correspondence from Christians. The Philadelphia News and other discriminating journals follow suit and crib without credit. Our esteemed local contemporary, the Enquirer, more generously, gives the Sun full credit. But if it had taken the item from the INTELLIGENCER directly, it would have found it in more interesting form and could have printed it nearly a week earlier.

THE REORDER of Luzerne county, with other of the county officials, have made up their minds to oppose the new salary act of 1885; which applies to counties of more than 100,000 and less than 500,000 population. Claiming that the county had a population of over 500,000, they applied to the county commissioners to be paid under the act of 1876, covering counties having more than that population, and the court has decided in their favor. It is hard to see how the point that Luzerne has more than 500,000 people within its borders was established. It is said to have been done by taking the ratio of the taxable population, and a cruder way could not be suggested. In 1880 Luzerne had a population of 53,965, and Lancaster 130,447. If Luzerne was increasing for the past four years at the rate of 4.25 per cent, she may have a population of 100,000; but to do that she must more than double the increase in this county from 1870 to 1880.

Extraordinary Presumption of Office-Seekers.

Washington, Baltimore Sun. Modesty has never been a noted trait of the average American politician, yet making all reasonable allowance for this fact, it is extraordinary that vanity and presumption will lead office-seekers so frequently to aspire to places beyond the merits and the ability of the candidates. Fully one-half of those who have appeared in print in the last two or three days as applicants for certain offices are so entirely unqualified for the positions to which they would make a hollow mockery of the civil service principles and professions which Mr. Cleveland has enunciated. He gave a lesson yesterday which they will not soon forget to several congressmen who, under the pretense of calling to pay respects, undertook to prefer claims of their friends to offices. They were informed promptly and decisively by the president that he did not propose to receive personally applications for office, that all such must come through the proper heads of departments. This decision of the president will relieve him from one of the greatest annoyances to which his predecessors have been subjected, and will break up the custom of office-hunting delegations haunting the White House.

Is She in a Trance?

At Mount Clemens, Mich., a week ago Mrs. Charles Ballensen, a woman of 70, suddenly expired. It was supposed, of heart disease, and the funeral took place Tuesday. The life-like appearance of the body excited much comment, which increased after burial. Finally the interest grew so intense that it was thought best to disinter the body, and this was accomplished on Thursday afternoon, the body having been in the grave two days and two nights. It still bore the same life-like appearance. It was placed in a room in which temperature has been kept steadily at 70°. Not the slightest indication of decomposition is apparent, and physicians declare themselves unable to determine whether Mrs. Ballensen is alive or dead.

Why Dakota is Proud.

These are some of the things which make Dakota proud. It has 2,500 miles of railway, more than any one of twenty old settled states. It has 2,000 school houses, more than any one of fifteen states. It has 275 newspapers, more than any New England state except Massachusetts, or any Eastern state except New York and Pennsylvania. In the number of post-offices it ranks about twenty-third states and territories, and pays more revenue to the postoffice department than any one of thirty-two states, and it has a population as large as Nebraska or Connecticut, and nearly twice as large as Vermont or Florida.

The History of a Famous Poem.

Mrs. Sarah T. Bolton, the poetess, visited the Indiana legislature on Friday, both branches being in recess, to hear the lady for a few minutes. In the House she told how she came to write the popular poem, "Paddle Your Own Canoe." More than 30 years ago her husband was state librarian, and as it became necessary for the legislative halls to be furnished with carpet, and when she purchased 500 yards of carpet, and when she returned she with but little help sewed it together and put it down. While thus engaged she wrote the poem which has made her famous.

THE NEW AMERICAN NOVEL.

"THE MONEY MAKER," a Social Parable. New York, D. Appleton & Co., 1884. Pp. 387. Here is an American novel, written by an American, in the manner born; written of American men and women; of American social and political life; for an American purpose, and by a representative of that most characteristic American estate—journalism.

All of this possibly could have been said of other books that have preceded it—and still the Great American Novel lingers. So be it. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was written with a purpose and it served it. "Tourge's" "Foot's Errand" had a purpose; it challenged public attention because of "The Bread Winners," which was no accidental success, despite its literary deficiencies. Scores of "American novels"—novels of New York society, novels of Washington politics, and novels of sentiment, with a good deal more of literary finish than any of the books quoted, have fallen dead and flat.

Now and then a novel comes along that tells just what a vast number of people have been thinking and saying to themselves. "Helen's Babble" attained its phenomenal popularity because of "The Bread Winners," which were in a million households. Here comes a book that under the guise of fiction, on a passable plot, with familiar characters, gives us a view of metropolitan journalism, of modern politics, of labor agitation, of fashionable dissipation, of worldly women and still more worldly men, of selfish, sordid wealth, of good hearted, half-educated womanhood that falls something short of heroic; a book that deals, in short, with just such people and such events as were familiar in Washington, New York and Chicago some fifteen years ago.

When this is attempted by one who has studied history with eager zeal and viewed contemporaneous life on both continents with the eye of a journalist; by a graphic and eloquent writer with exuberant powers of expression, who has the gift of the gift of the Longfellow simile; "The Money Maker" is not a book to be read for the rights of man, for freedom of trade, for independence in journalism, in politics, and for the social elevation of the bread winners in society, the result is bound to be a book that will be read because it is so well written. It cannot be suppressed by those whom it offends; it cannot be kept out of the market by the studios indifference of the book reviewers whose employing journals are outraged at its brutal frankness.

The "Bread Winners" is in every respect a very much stronger book.

It has very grave faults of style, and these are not the least interesting features of it. Its characters are not portraits of actual people, for scarcely one of them is consistent wholly with the original from which it is drawn; and yet they are entirely natural and altogether possible, for nearly every individual portrayed attaches to some well-known individual and nearly every incident related has its counterpart in recent well-remembered events, and still more in associations from those of the book.

The opening chapter deals with an orange-mercer's celebration in New York in a very clever manner. It is marred by two pages of turgid and bombastic composition, which only serve to tell the reader that the author is one of the best and the worst characteristics of the first dozen pages. Much of the book deals with the motives and methods of modern journalism. They are meticulously laid bare to the reader, and he has seen them on the inside. It takes no acuteness to discover that the Tribune and Whitehall Reid, the Sun and its editor and other metropolitan journals and their attacks, have contributed to the author much of his material. It would not be fair to say that the original to say that any one of "The Money Makers" newspapers or personages follows out continuously a single actual journal or journalist of New York. It is easy to suspect, however, that the writer has a theory as to the mysterious author of the "Bread Winners," and that he identifies him with a former New York journalist, whom he lashes in the character of the author of the principal figures in the "Money Makers" and one of the most odious.

The reader is scattered in the book that merits our unqualified respect and admiration. The bad are very bad indeed; and the weak, thoroughly contemptible; and the good are not unimpaired good, and the reformers are a rather impetuous and unsteady set. But all this is perfectly natural and very much to be expected in a novel of this kind. The disposition of fast young men in New York; their orgies and intrigues; the secrets of the green-room and the loose morals of the stage and the theatre; the life of a faithless picture of life that every active journalist has come in contact with and every observer has seen; the life of a faithless picture of life that every active journalist has come in contact with and every observer has seen; the life of a faithless picture of life that every active journalist has come in contact with and every observer has seen.

And in respect that the author better shown his skill and fidelity to nature than in his final disposition of the characters, his own ending of the parable and his frank acknowledgment of his inability to solve the problems he proposes, and that he weighs so heavily upon our society and will be "unmerited rewards and unwarded merit; hapless love and loveless happiness; misery living the shackles and fetters and the agony holding the leech of the flesh to its own skin; the inevitable doom of the man who draughts of the life-giving nectar. Money not only the law but the gospel of life; Money the law; Money, the priest at the altar; Money that worship whose creed is inequality and whose god is Mammon."

The book is full of faults, as it is full of excellences; it abounds in crudities as it sparkles with exquisitely cut gems of philosophic thought and epigrammatic force; it displays the most inexcusable affectations of learning, and it contains elegant pages worthy of Macaulay. It excites the constant wonder that its author, who has so much to say, does not do better; and it challenges at every turn admiration for rare delineation of character and acute and penetrating insight into human life. It is a volume, earnest, protest against the frivolous and mercenary tendencies of the age and the wrongs committed through the secured greed of gold, the fatal Milan touch that spares nothing, hardens all in its path and so loses the joy of existence. "Beauty lies in unimpeded and iron wheels, that the good and true that might spring from human lives." Who should not hail a book, a parable, a teacher who sets out in modern form the old story of the Good Samaritan and the Vanity Fair, the ceaseless strife of the Prince of Light and the Powers of Darkness, the ancient battle in which "strong soul and high endeavor" was as sorely tried as now, in the latter days of commercial sordidness, of social and of political corruption? And if the author is incompetent and unsteady, the problem left unsolved, who shall blame the novelist that he is not a prophet?

Did Not Know It Was Longfellow. Dr. C. C. Everett, of Cambridge, relates that at Interlaken, Switzerland, he dropped into a bookstore and circulating library. "The good woman who had charge," he says, "was a chatty body, and I fell into conversation with her. She told me above other things of an incident that had happened to her some time ago. Two gentlemen came in one day; the one, a fine looking man with white hair and beard, the other younger. The older asked her which of all the books in her library she could best recommend to him. She brought him Longfellow's 'Hyperion' which she told him she had just purchased. He was a book which delighted everybody. After they had gone out, the younger one came back and put it down. While thus engaged she wrote the poem which has made her famous."

PERSONAL.

WALT WHITMAN is spoken of for an important consular post by an important administration. ROSS INGERSOLL says he would rather live to be loved by a woman in a world full of trouble than to live in heaven with nobody but men.

DR. ELLERBIE WALLACE, who for 37 years was connected with the Jefferson Medical college, died in Philadelphia on Monday morning.

FRANK'S GUYARD'S marriage to Miss Elizabeth Buehler, daughter of Charles Buehler, of Harrisburg, is announced for March 18, in the latter city. The groom is an old Lancasterian with many friends in this city.

SARDOU is very peculiar looking, small and spiky in figure, and alert and bright-eyed as a lizard. The Englishness of his face has something of the fine antique mould of the same portion of the countenance of Edwin Booth.

GEORGE GRANT'S contract with the Century company, concerning which so much has been written, calls for four articles from Gen. Grant on Shiloh, Vicksburg, Chattanooga and Wilderness. The agreed price for these articles was $500 for each, and this is the sum that has been paid.

FRED BURMAN, says Mr. Edmund Yates, is a man of great ability. He was always extraordinarily ill-dressed—frequently in black, with a huge moustache around his throat.

GENERAL EDWARD E. WALLACE, Secretary of the Massachusetts State Board of Agriculture, is on his way to Washington. The appointment gives universal satisfaction, he being one of the most distinguished lawyers of the state and a man of great ability.

MR. WHITTIER sent the following to the Portland committee in charge of the raising of the Longfellow replica: "The gift of the Westminster Abbey committee cannot fail to add another strong tie of sympathy between the English and American peoples. And never was gift more fittingly bestowed. The city of Portland—the poet's birthplace, 'beautiful for situation,' looking from his hills on the scenery he loved so well, entering the bay and the many islands bay and far inland mountains, detectable in sunset, needed this sculpture as a memorial of his illustrious son, and may well testify her joy and gratitude at its reception, and repeat in so doing the words of the Hebrew prophet: 'O man, greatly beloved! Thou shalt stand in thy place.'"

An Estate Without an Heir. The two-story brick dwelling at Greenville, Pa., dedicated to infidelity and spiritualism by Dr. David Edgar, was sold at public auction on May 20, 1884, but the sale was not confirmed. On January 17, 1885, in the orphan's court of Mercer county, it was sold to the petition of Mrs. Edna Hamilton. It was sold the first time under the condition that the sale should not be valid unless his daughter, Mary Elizabeth, who is mysteriously absent, should be heard from. The large and valuable estate to the cause of spiritualism, and directed that this particular building, in the centre of the town, should be used as a place of worship, and so dearly, and to which he bequeathed his entire estate. His daughter, Edna Hamilton, who has been in Ohio, thirteen years ago. She was teaching fancy needlework and making artificial flowers. She has since been married to Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Hoyt, and has a son, Frank, perhaps, twenty-six years of age. The doctor used to exhibit a communication from the orphan's court, signed by his daughter, stating that she had died in 1869. A friend of the doctor's met Mary Elizabeth some thirteen years ago in the Dayton office. He found her well and talked with her, and so informed the doctor, yet he persisted in relying on the spirit letter.

Hissing a Lord Mayor.

LETTER FROM GENERAL JOHN E. MULLFORD. 21 DEY STREET, NEW YORK, OCTOBER 5, 1883. For years past I have used ALCOCK'S PAIN EXPELLER on my person and in my family, and have found them to be of an extraordinary remedy, quick in their action, giving immediate relief without blistering the skin, and far superior to all other remedies. I should be without ALCOCK'S PAIN EXPELLER, their healing powers are wonderful, and their efficacy far-reaching and lasting. When in Washington last winter I was induced to try another much advertised plaster for severe pain in my back. No relief from the pain, but a sore and blistered back for weeks was the result. So soon as the blisters healed I applied two of ALCOCK'S PAIN EXPELLERS, and they gave me immediate and permanent relief. They give additional strength and vitality to the system, and they are a never failing remedy in my family for Coughs, Colds, Sprains, and all Pains and Weaknesses. They have recently saved my little son from Cholera Infantum. I can testify to them, and would not be without them for any consideration. JOHN E. MULLFORD.
