GIVING IN MARRIAGE.

Come, let us sit together for a space.
In this still room remote from friendly mirth,
Afar from light and music, face to face,
Each unto each the dearest thing on earth.
Love, they have left us, our two bonny brides,
Our tall grave girl, our winsome laughing pet;
Ah me! How wide the chasm that divides
Our life from theirs: how far their feet are set
From the calm path they tred with us so long.
How we shall miss them, we who loved them

On Winter nights when winds are blowing on Summer mornings, when the roses blow.
On Summer mornings, when the roses blow.
But—happy but—we still clasp hand in hand,
Eye still meets uye, and true hearts understar

Love, they have left us empty of the mirth
That cheered our homestead while they s
journed here;
Yea, they have left us louely on the earth,
Lone, but together, sollinde most dear;
Ah, God, go with them to the stranger nests,
That love has built for them and theirs
come.

come.

God keep all warm and living in their breasts
Love's holy flame, the altar fire of hous.

Dear, they have left us; we no longer hold
The first, best place, however leaf each heart
Yet have we treasure left, refined gold,
Love's sterling ore, without its baser part.
The wide old house has lost its nestling birds.

But we are left. Ah. love, what need of words
+From All the Year Round.

LIEE'S MID-WAY.

Is it strange that, with a longing
And a cry of bungry pain,
I should turn from unknown future.
To the joyous past again?
Is it strange that, looking backward,
All or bappiness remember,
Naught of sadness and regret?

Only that to me they'll come not;
Ne'er again am I to see
Those bright days of happy springtime—
What the summer held for me.
Faded—re the dashes;
Dead the roses of my June;
Dying are the flewers of August—
Autumn days will reach me soon.

Thus in the rainless, almost cloudless, summer of Bokhara, though forty degrees north of the equator, the fruit of the vine is often ripe by the end of June, the soil requiring artificial irrigation, while in other equally warm but more cloudy climes the grapes do not mature until late in September. It has been found that even in the tundra of Siberia on hillsides exposed vertically to the sun's rays herbaceous vegetation with "large, splendid-colored flowers," according to Middendorff, is observed; but it is far otherwise in adjacent plains where the solar rays reach the soil horizontally.
