THE CEMETERIES OF GENOA. A Peculiar Custom That Prevails in the Italian Countries.

It is the custom in the Italian countries, says a letter to the Chicago Times, often to place photographs of the people at the graves, and in many instances the marble faces I saw were the same as the picture-some handsome, some plain, some ugly, but all human and real, and nothing idealized. The clothing, too, was perfect, collars, cuffs, bats,neckties, and patterns of gentlemen's clothes and ladles' silk or brocade dresses being given in perfection. Thus the styles of the day are served, and I, careless observer, saw articles of wearing apparel the fashion of which dates far back in the past. Two groups I saw here rise distinctly before my mind still An advocate in his full court dress, life-size, standing in a commanding position ready to speak, while his wife stood by the pedestal weeping, bearing on her head a veil just like the black Spanish veil worn here a great deal instead of a bonnet; the a young girl on a bed, Christ, life-size, ing by her, and below the friends kneeling and weeping. I suppose there were at least 200 like these. Each is elaborate and interesting in its way. Everywhere we went the air was perfumed with shrubs, which are cultivated here instead of flowers. In the open ground each grave is marked with a cross for a headstone, and all the crosses face in the same direction rights, since the contract of the contrac in the same direction, giving singular uni-formity in appearance. The effect of the whole scene was most quiet and beautiful. French Wit on English Boorishness. The following is a Frenchman's notion of the gallantry of the English. 'Twas at a fancy fair. A wealthy Englishman, a wellknown personage, approached a stall where a fair lady was serving to gentlemen. "How much for a cup?" inquired Albion's sou.

"Five Napoleons," retorted the fair vendor.
"Here are ten, then," replied the Englishman, taking up a cup of tea. "O! my lord!", exclaimed the lady, overpowered. "Such a display of generosity deserves a reward. She plunged her rosy lips into the boiling tea.
"Oh! very good!" cried the Englishman.
Now here are five more Napoleons and please give me a clean cup." HON. ROBERT M. McLANE, Governor of Maryland, writes:—I have given "Dr. Petzold's German Bitters" a trial and am glad to add my testimony to it, and can cheerfully recommend it as a pure and pleasant Tonic and Appetizer.

Two months ago I suffered with a very bad

recommended to put on my chest two Allcock's

Allcock's Porous Plasters and they completely cured me. F. McGINNISS.
