"No man, not even Garfield or Phillips, had more intensely bitter enemies in New England than Theodore Parker. There is no use disguising the fact, this late day, that as a whole, what were called the 'better class' in Boston were opposed to him, and that they especially deprecated the bold stand he took against slavery and against the churches which, in his judgment, were altogether too timid and time-serving and afraid to lift up their volces in rebuke of asystem which, in his eyes, was the sum of all abominations and vil-lables. Writing to a friend, after having eyes, was the sum of all abominations and vil-lainies. Writing to a friend, after having ground out one of his largest grists, in the form of a sermon preached in his Music hall 'mill' on Fast day, the subject of his discourse being 'The Chief Sins of the People,' he says : 'Men in the streets look long-favored at me as I go by. Nevertheless the good God lets the skies rain on me and the sun shine (I saw my shadow to day), and I am allowed to ride in the cars and walk on the sidewalk.'"
