The Repudiating States.

The Philadelphia Times is disturbed by the influence of the bondholders of the repudiating states should be used to secure a distribution of the surplus revenues of the country among the states; its text being a newspaper story that the bondholders of Tennessee propose to ask Congress to make such distribution of the surplus revenues, and to enact that the share of the repudiating states shall be used to redeem their bonds. There is probably no foundation for this statement, save the reflection that it is manifestly to the bondholders' interest that a fund should be thus provided for their payment. They are not likely, however, to urge their ill-treatment by the states as a reason for an appropriation by Congress to the offending states. Congress would be little likely to feel like putting the national treasury between such states as Tennessee and their financial dishonesty. No one outside the repudiating states disputes the disgrace they have brought on themselves and the national fame by their dishonorable refusal to redeem bonds to which they have solemnly pledged their faith and honor. They do not deserve reward from their nation; and it will not be an effective reason prevailing upon Congress to distribute the surplus national revenue among the states, that there are a number of them who have deliberately dishonored their obligations. If such distribution should be made, the demand of the holders of repudiated state bonds that their obligations should be paid by the United States out of the fund going to any state, would be just one that Congress would be likely to recognize; yet it would feel that the bondholders' ill-treatment was not a cause for the appropriation, but for the withholding of it. So that it is not likely that the bondholders will present their suffering to Congress as an inducement to a distribution of surplus revenues.

There would seem to be a need that Congress should take some action looking towards the removal from the national fame of the stain of repudiation which rests so heavily upon it because of the conduct of a number of the states, the most prominent offenders now being Virginia and Tennessee, though in their company, in Virginia the United States courts have come to the bondholders' aid, and other help they seem to have none; all the political parties having abandoned them to their fate. In Tennessee the courts and the people both have sat down on them. There seems to be no salvation for the bondholder when the question of paying him is submitted to the people who pay. They vote with enthusiasm that they will not pay; and only a corporal's guard can be mustered in a state to say nay to the most flagrant violation of its pledged faith. Doubtless it is human nature. Probably any aggregation of debtors would vote not to pay if there was no way of making them.

There seems to be no way of making a state pay; and, as it appears that its people may refuse to pay, even when they undeniably owe, the question arises for the nation whether it is going to stand the stigma of this popular weakness.

What is "Personal Warfare"? The following, from the Philadelphia Times, is a fair specimen of the drift of so-called Independent discussion of the pending campaign for state treasurer:

If the Democrats shall get earnestly in line for a campaign which will accommodate him with the liveliest sort of a contest. There has plenty of nasty campaign literature, such as was flung into the campaign against Blaine and Cleveland; but the public mind was never so heartily disgusted with party scandals as in the late national contest, and there will be little inclination to welcome a personal warfare against Quay.

We do not know that the Democrats have or could procure, or would use any such "nasty campaign literature," against Quay as was flung into the late campaign against Blaine and Cleveland; nor that anybody is disposed to wage a "personal warfare against Quay." His home and private affairs are not likely to be invaded, nor his personal relations assailed, whatever they may be.

But if the Times means to stigmatize as "personal warfare," and to announce that "the public mind" will not tolerate, a complete and searching inquiry into Mr. Quay's relations with public affairs during the last twenty years, we think the Times is mistaken, that it does injustice to the public mind and counts too largely on the cowardice of the Democratic press and party.

The discussion of Mr. Quay's part in controlling state legislation, his motives in having bills passed, his interest in having other legislation defeated, his connection with the riot damage bill bribery of the legislature and with the pardon of the convicts, his responsibility for the creation of a useless, expensive and burdensome office in Philadelphia, designed for his own advantage, and his alleged association with a grave treasury scandal—all of these are public matters, very proper subjects for public discussion, and directly bearing upon his fitness for the office to which he has been nominated.

Does the Times mean that a discussion of these things will be construed as "personal warfare" and that the "public mind" is in such condition that it shrinks from an investigation of this kind and will condemn those who institute it? If so, God save the commonwealth.

The Bible in the Public Schools. There is a very interesting case on trial in Sharpville, Mercer county, involving the right of school directors to use the Protestant version of the Bible at the opening of the daily school exercises. Judge Mehard has not yet rendered his decision and it is awaited with more than ordinary curiosity. The plaintiffs in the suit are members of the Roman Catholic church, who claim their children are required to listen to the King James version of the Bible, which version their church teaches them to regard as not authentic. The defendants admit the use of the particular version of the Bible, but declare that as it is read without note or comment, it cannot successfully be charged that it is used with a sectarian end in view.

The question is by no means a new one. It has been argued in other states with varying results. To study it in its proper light it is necessary to examine the state constitution in its bearings on the subject of religious liberty. As the burden of proof rests upon the party maintaining the affirmative of a proposition, it is needful that the defendants show that their act of introducing the St. James version into the schools is warranted by the constitution. This, we believe, cannot be done.

Section 3 of the Declaration of Rights declares the liberty of conscience that makes it impossible to unite church and state: "No man can, of right, be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his own consent." This clearly evinces that the framers of the constitution intended to preclude all possibility of directing the individual member of society in his civil and spiritual capacity at one and the same time. With this thought kept in mind, the step is easy to section 2, article X of the constitution: "No money raised for the support of the public schools of the commonwealth shall be appropriated to or used for the support of any sectarian school." It is clear, therefore, if any public school commits a sectarian act, the appropriation to it becomes wrongful, unless it changes its course.

The sectarian or denominational point is the real kernel of the nut of the Sharpville school question. The Roman Catholic is taught to believe that the King James version of the Bible is filled with error. To him the Douay version is the only Bible and, moreover, he has been instructed that the Good Book can only be truly interpreted by the priests of his church to which he bows in spiritual allegiance. On the other hand, the Protestant views the Douay version with suspicion; we suspect that a Catholic teacher who would read it in the schools would be the subject of complaint from the rigid Protestant parents of his pupils.

The fact that neither the King James nor the Douay version is universally accepted by Christians as the true one is conclusive that each is the possession of a sect or sects. Being the property of a sect, its use becomes sectarian, and as an abstract question of law there seems to be no escape from the conclusion that the use of a particular version of the Scriptures in the schools is a "sectarian" use that is not in accord with the law of the commonwealth. Practically, however, there are few communities in which this question is a disturbing one. Common sense and religious tolerance rule most places and, where these are not strong enough to prevent any disturbance, the best plan is to quietly avoid any occasion for offense.

Stealing a Telegraph.

The Western Union Telegraph company has just given a notable illustration of the weakness of its condition by forcibly taking possession of the lines of the American Rapid, a competing line. The special wire of this line to New York, which runs into the INTELLIGENCER office, was found to be silent this morning, and the discovery was made that the Western Union had gone into the office of the company in New York with a force of men and had cut the wires. The American Rapid is in the hands of a receiver and was about being reorganized. It was operated by the Bankers and Merchants' company, which is also in a receivers' hands. The Western Union seems to have secured some sort of a hold upon the American Rapid, through its receiver, out of whose hands it was passed yesterday by sale. It secured from a plaintiff judge in New York an order for the postponement of the sale for a week, and another order requiring the Bankers and Merchants' company to surrender the American Rapid's property to the Western Union. Gen. Eckert, president of the latter, made personal demand for this property yesterday afternoon, and when it was not immediately given to him sent a force of men, who cut all the lines of wire of both the Bankers and Merchants' and the American Rapid, and took them into the Western Union office.

It is clear enough that no company, strong in any other than physical power, should undertake any such border ruffian methods in its business. Such a company, which is the property of Jay Gould, is administered by his methods. He is returning to the practices of his earlier days in the Erie railway, when he had Jim Fiske for his bully. General Eckert cannot so well fill the bill. The play this time will not be successful. But it certainly shows by its desperate character, the desperate condition of the Western Union company; which can only live by getting rid of its opposition lines; and as it cannot buy them out with worthless stock it undertakes to beat them out by force.

Disarming the Cheyennes.

The proposition to disarm the Cheyenne Indians, is very much like cooking the rabbit before it is caught, as it involves the final settling of the whole Indian question. To attempt the disarming of a tribe which has not yet broken out into open hostility, but is only supposed to be uneasy would be a very different matter from taking the weapons from a band which, after being beaten in a campaign, finds itself forced to accept any terms from its conqueror.

Even admitting (what is hardly possible), that this disarming can be accomplished without bloodshed, by the sudden action of an overwhelming force; what will be the effect of this degradation, for degradation it will be to the Indian, upon the other tribes still armed and upon Cheyenne themselves.

It follows then, that all the tribes must be disarmed, and that all must then be kept disarmed, and this last will be hard to enforce, for there is no better purchaser to be found for arms and ammunition than the Indian, and there are no more unscrupulous wide awake traders than those who are found in the Indian country.

The Indian, they say, needs no arms, he can no longer depend upon game for his food; true, but the same may be said of the cowboy, the ranchman, and of the miner, disarm them also; and then, these hunting parties which every season invade the regions where stray antelope or big-horn is still to be met with, all these must be disarmed, or the strong will prey upon the weak, collisions will occur and the Indian will see that he has no course left, but to dig up his buried Winchester, to fall back on his most inaccessible mountains, and like a bandit fight it out to the death.

PATTON seems to revert the constitution in the same degree that the legislators have scored it.

It used to be commonly supposed that the "disarmers" whose lives are spent at a distance from the seat of politics, and who are not acquainted with the best workers of the ward, were in no way entitled to the emoluments of political place. The recognition of literary men, however, has of late years become so general that it is more advantageous to be a poet than a party worker in order to secure a good administration place. This change of public sentiment toward members of the literary profession is emphasized by the recent appointment of Ebon E. Rexford, author of "Silver Threads Among the Clouds," to the position of Commissioner of the State, which he will occupy in Shickston, Wis. He will get $22,000 annually from the government in this capacity. Had he received his just deserts he would have gotten seven years.

How would it do to solve the Indian problem by kicking the rascally white traders out of the Indian reservations?

Says the Philadelphia Press: "The Morning Watcher" flag at half mast on the Fourth of July, but no flag was visible over the interior department, or the department of justice at Washington, or over the state capitol building, or over the government building in Cincinnati. In inquiring as to the fitness of applicants for office in future, the board of examiners, whether they know on what day of the year the Fourth of July comes and what event it is intended to celebrate.
