HIS POEM READ AT HIS GRAVE.

Dr. W. A. Barry, who died Monday evening at Jonestown, Lebanon county, after a lingering illness, was buried at Reading, Thursday. The only service at the grave was the reading of a poem which Dr. Barry composed two weeks before his death, and which was read at the grave by his request, as follows:

When o'er my cold and lifeless clay
The parting words of love are said,
And friends and kindred meet to pay
Their last fond tribute to the dead,
Let no stern priest, with solemn drone,
A funeral liturgy intone,
Whose creed is foreign to my own.

Let not a word be whispered there
In pity for my unbelief,
Or sorrow that I could not share
The view that gave their souls relief.
My faith to me is no less dear,
No less convincing and sincere
Than theirs, so rigid and austere.

Let no stale words of church-born song
Float out upon the silent air,
To prove by implication wrong
The soul of him then lying there.
Why should such words be glibly sung
O'er one whose living tongue
Such empty phrases never sung?

But rather let the faithful few,
Whose hearts are knit so close to mine
That they with time the dearer grew,
Assemble at the day's decline;
And while the golden sunbeams fall
In floods of light upon my pall,
Let them in softened tones recall

Some tender memory of the dead,
Some virtuous act, some words of power,
Which I perchance have done or said,
By loved ones treasured to that hour:
Recount the deeds which I admired,
The motive which my soul inspired,
The hope by which my heart was fired.

RELIGION VS. ANARCHY.

The Unbelief of Those who Unfurl and March Behind the Red Flag

From the Syracuse Standard.,

Two classes of persons reject religion, besides the very few from whose mental constitution the ideas and emotions of the religious nature are omitted. The majority of those who profess atheism or agnosticism are either the ignorant and degraded or the superficially cultivated and egoistic. The former are ruined by misfortune; the latter are spoiled by good fortune. The former have had a desolate experience, through which they are hardly able to discern a benevolent Creator or Providence; the latter have come through uninterrupted prosperity and a one-sided culture to the opinion that there is no mind superior to their own in the universe.

When scholars and "gentlemen" despise religion, they dissent in private, or in clubhouses, or, at the most, in magazine essays. But the proletariat does not rest content with this mild, negative protest: it makes a positive utterance of its infidelity—assails establishments of worship in blasphemous tirades, takes irreligious sentiments for its mottoes, and attacks the institutions over which the church stands guard. Attention is directed, of late, to the legends inscribed on the banners of Chicago Anarchists; and many are found of the sort represented by this inscription: "We want no God, no religion and no masters." The men who paraded under that banner also march behind the red flag, inveigh against property, are the foes of marriage, plot treason and murder, and put their plans in execution. They do not stop with the civil cavil, the polite sneer, the materialistic argument. It may make no seeming difference to the polished skeptic, smiling at Christian faith over his wine, whether there be an all-wise, all-loving governor of the world. He has little in a worldly way of which to complain; but to the man with whom fate and society have not dealt so indulgently the difference is immense. If there be no benevolent purpose behind the inequalities of social conditions, no power that works for righteousness, that aids the noble endeavor, confounds the evil and rebukes the selfish, why should he bear with an uncomfortable lot or trust moral agencies to make the world more tolerable for him and his posterity? If he be already allied to the baser orders of society, his unbelief keeps him at his original level; if he have not yet descended to the grade of those who horse nothing from this life or the life to come, the despair of his creedless estate usually reduces him to their companionship. Hatred of mankind is the master passion at those depths; alliance in crime is the bond of comradeship. Irreligion may be a private matter when fops or literati profess it; it is a public concern when accepted by the brotherhood of poverty or crime.

Perhaps many who had boasted their insensibility to devout impressions, seeing their doctrines in the horrid glare of nihilistic war, will learn sobriety, and talk in whispers for a while, or admit the practical value of churches and pious convictions. Like worldly-wise old Major Pendennis, they may even attend divine services itself for the influence of their pattern, paying all the deference involved in the doctrine that religion is the mainstay of governments, guardian of public peace and inspirer of the domestic virtues.

The Bondage of Dress.

Jennie June says that women take dressing "too seriously," and that with their faculty for martyrdom, they make martyrs of themselves in the matter of fashion. But how many of us have wished that Dryden's beautiful sentiment ("Virtue though in rags shall keep me warm") was something more than a sentiment, and that we might indeed be like the lilies of the field, who neither toil nor spin.

It is one thing to make dress one's whole aim in life, and another to like to be daintily and neatly attired, and the woman who is so indifferent as not to desire the latter, is scarcely womanly, to my mind. It is not a long purse always that makes a well-dressed woman; indeed, if one has only a limited amount to spend for clothes, it is easier perhaps to avoid dowdyness. The taste of the wearer is more important than money. I have known women who would dress better on a hundred dollars a year, than others on five times that sum; so if Providence has blessed you with plenty of "saint-seducing gold," you can order your costumes from Worth, and you have no use for this article.

Taking one year with another, it is quite possible for a woman to clothe herself prettily on much less than a hundred dollars. In order to do this you must never try to be—in fact, you must avoid being—in the extreme fashion, as extremes are never popular long, and when once out of fashion, are always ridiculous. Always buy a good article. If you cannot afford a good silk dress, buy a cloth or camel's hair. Let whatever you get be the best of its kind. The materials for making up (the making, if you do not do it yourself,) cost as much for a cheap dress as for a better one. You will have more satisfaction from a handsome toilette, although you may be obliged to wear it for several years, than you will from the same sum expended on two or three cheap suits. There are plenty of low-priced goods, such as the "tourist cloth," now so fashionable, that are both durable and stylish, but it is the cheap goods of which there are better qualities that are to be especially avoided.

Rev. Sam Jones' Eccentricities.

From a Sermon at Baltimore.

Now, don't bother yourselves about my eccentricities. They are not natural. They are all artificial. I put 'em on merely to attract you here. Just look around and see what a crowd you make. (Laughter.) A good but tedious preacher, who could not draw large congregations, was advised that if he would announce that there would be earthen dogs in the pew next Sunday thousands of curious persons would come to see the poodles. (Laughter.) Another preacher advertised that he would kick the panel out of the pulpit. (Laughter.) The church was thronged and there were 5,000 outside trying to get in. After he had got as many in the church as the building would hold he kicked the panel out as he promised and then preached an earnest sermon. Thank God, the good man had a panel to kick! (Laughter.) I have heard that some people say they won't come to hear me because they don't like my style and methods, and do not wish to encourage me. Now, my friends, I don't want encouragement. I was doing well before I came here, and I reckon I'll get along when I leave. (Laughter and applause.) I shall continue to get three square meals a day and tolerably good clothes, and that's about all you'll have. A preacher said to me, "Mr. Jones, I prayed God to change your methods, and a voice seemed to say to me that if you were changed you would be as dull as I am." (Laughter.) May the Lord help every man to preach the gospel as he thinks best. I am ready to change my methods just as soon as somebody shows me a style by which I can catch more fish. (Laughter. But before I swop my hook and line for somebody else's, let me see how many fish he has on his string. (Laughter.)
