NOTES FOR THE FARMER.

The Advantages, Temporary and Permanent of Close and Thorough Cultivation. From the Farm Journal

Cultivation pulverizes and loosens the soil, thus admitting air and moisture. Air and moi-ture dissolve the plant food in the soil, making it available to the growing Crops.

Surface, or shallow, cultivation prevents evaporation and consequently, the drying out of the subsoil in case of drought. THE GREAT ENGLISH REMEDY.

On account of counterfeits, we have adopted Shallow cultivation is sufficient in soil that is naturally losse and porous, in soil deeply worked previous to planting, and is best where crops are well advanced in their recently.

Deep cultivation is required where the ground is inclined to pack, in soil not thoroughly prepared before planting, or where it has been compacted by heavy dashes of rain. But it must not be practised except when the crops are young.

Whether it is better to hill up or to give that cultivation is a matter of season, soil and crop. Celery, sweet potatoes, and perhaps other crops require ridges or hills. Early in the season and in wet land crops will do best in ridges that in diffarent circumstances would succeed better under level culture. While the plants are young, run the culti-vator close to them; as they grow, keep fur-

Cutting off the roots of a plant in the early stages of growth, checks the growth for a while, but it quickly throws out a half dozen rosslets for every one cut off, and takes a firmer hold of the soil and of life. Cultivation, therefore, increases the feed-ing causetty of plants by increasing the num-

ing capacity of plants by increasing the num-ber of mouths of tine, throus roots. The cultivation of crops during the early stages of growth should be thorough and

In the application of these principles to particular crops and soils every farmer must use his own judgment. In the matter of tools for cultivating all kinds of crops the supply is ample and the quality first-class, in a cream jar. This portion of the milk is so rich in butter fats that it well pays to churn it all, and saves the labor of setting and skimming.

Cutting grass early prevents many weeds from going to seed. By cutting early two crops may be secured, which are better than one, even if the one is bigger than either of the two. By cutting twice you get two whacks at the weeds which is one point gained theroby.

Remember that when the chicks are small, and are caught in heavy, sudden showers, it is not the drenching from above that injures them as much as the water on the ground, which compels the hens to hover them in a small pond, which so chilis them that they soon droop and die. Always have a shelter

Harness that has been on a borse's back as often hung up just as taken from the horse—the leather all wet with sweat, and the traces and reins perhaps twisted into knots—retains the same shape when dry, and when forced into its original form the damage done the stitching and leather soon places. places it beyond repair. Tarred paper is excellent for driving away lice, and may be whitewashed, if desired. It is better than any other material for the inside of the coops and houses, but on the roof, in summer it draws heat, and renders the interior very unbomfortable, especially if the birds are somewhat crowded. It is very easily torn, unless the three-ply be used, and should be put on closely and then fastened with lath as strips, so as to have it firm.
