APPLE-TIME Come and see the chubby faces Peep from under lifted leaves, Which the noisy breeze displaces.

What a jolly tune it weaves ! Crimson faces, scarlet faces, Faces green, and gold, and brown For a troop of tricksy gobiles Only last night wandered down,

In apple-time How the rough old boughs are tossing, In the cool and crispy air: Do you hear the children crossing

O'er the meadows, here and there Goblin faces, peeping, hiding, Seem to great them every one; And the orchard rows are ringing With the froite and the fun, In apple time

Oh: the little hands that dip in Baskets shallow, baskets deep, Where the russet and the pippin Mingle in a shining heap! Long before the sunset's glory

Orchard boughs are ione and base But another golden autumn Sees the gobitn faces there. In apple-time: -By George Cooper

OF COURSE THEY MUST MARRY. The Natural Result of a Romantic Adventure i the Untskills. A romance which will result in a fashions ble wedding in Brooklyn in the near future, had its foundation the past summer in a Catskill mountain farm house near Hunter, Greene county, N. Y. The young lady, who is in her teens, is the only daughter of s prominent Brooklyn man. She is beautiful and accomplished. The prospective groom is about 39 years of age, but his stern settled manner makes him appear older. Up to a few months ago he was considered to be a confirmed old bachelor, crusty withal, and misanthropical in his views of life. Last June he was advised by a physician and his friends to give up business for a while and seek rest in some quiet spot among the seek rest in some quiet spot among the mountains. Very reluctantly he made preparations. A pleasant farm house near Hunter was selected.

Among the few other boarders at the house were two ladies from Brooklyn, mother and daughter. The daughter was given to whist playing; so was the bachelor. The girl was fond of long, solitary walks; the bachelor had a similar weakness. One day the girl had a "thrilling experience, an account of which was published in the Sun at the time. The young lady went out one afternoon in which was published in the Nam at the time. The young lady went out one afternoon in company with a large Newfoundland dog, for a stroll through the celebrated Stony Clove, declaring as she left the house that she would bring home a chunk of ice, and perhaps a snow ball from the cave where ice is foung all the year round. The clove is only a short distance from the house, so no objection was raised to her proposed expedition. On her return the girl related her adventure as follows:

"After walking about a mile I turned round

"After walking about a mile I turned round to speak to Carlo, the dog, but the animal was nowhere in sight. I called him, but he did not come. Thinking he would soon reappear I went on alone. I saw some wild flowers and stopped to pick them. As I raised my head I saw several yards distant what I supposed to be the dog. "Come, old fellow," I called. There was some healtation, but it came closer and closer, but not until it was nearly upon me did I realize that I was almost in the clutches of a big black bear. I don't know anything after that, Mr.—says he found me perched in the low branches of a tree, nearly dead with fright, while the bear kept waich and guard near by. How I ever got up in the tree I cannot imagine, for I never could climb. Mr.—fred at the animal, but bruin turned tail and wallzed off into the woods apparently unhurt." "After walking about a mile I turned round into the woods apparently unhurt."

It was almost dark when the backelor and his fair burden arrived at the farm house. Parties had been sent out to search for the Parties had been sent out to search for the missing ones, and great anxiety had been felt by the inmates of the farm house. The girl did not recover from the effects of her escapade for several days, during which the bachelor begulied the hours to such good purpose that an engagement was announ soon afterward.

A large bear was killed in the Stony. Clove lew days after the event narrated above It was supposed to be identical with the one that made the girl "climb a tree." At all events Mr. — purchased bruin's shaggy hide, and a soft rug it will make for my lady's chamber.
