As elvillation has made peace and when interpret from entering on either by a commutation of the evil that they work. As elvillation has made peace more initing and war more terrible, so it will in time make strikes more rare, and when they do come, more prolonged and bitter. Now they are like the wars of early ages, parterous and upresemble : but both arbarous and unreasonable ; but both sides are finding by degrees their strength and weakness. Capital is conceding point by point the rights of labor. Labor is learning that while attacking monopoly it cannot establish a monopoly of its own. The golden mean will be found in time. but we must expect to pay a golden price for it, and no counting of the cost can prevent the struggle of opposing forces. Let both sides reason calmiy and be sure they are right. Let both be firm but not stubborn, self-confident but not selfish, and the better adjustment of labor matters will not long be delayed.
