America, in 1982, he met Bescher personally several times and thanked him most heartily At the Delimonico banquet to Spencer Bescher made an eloquent speech. The influence of the recluse thinker on the popular preacher was profound. Not only Bescher's belief in evolution, but his desure to restrict rather than extend governmental functions was de-rived from Spencer. Once when Bescher and his sister Mrs. Stowe, were in Boston, they met Mr. Emer-son on the Common, who called them the William Wallace and Joan of Arc of liberty. Speaking of Emerson's emays, he said to 2 Canadian clergyman last summer, "They are like goblets of marbles, besulfful, but showing juxtaposition without connection." Speaking of authors, he said : "They are usually pleasanter in their books than per-sonally ; they are like newly made fires that won't go without a good deal of puffing." A friend once found him reading the Boston Index, a radical, free religious sheet, and asked if he liked it. "Well," said he, "1 find some good things in it ; it is like grann, which isn't good to eat." He loved to tell a story of an incapable youth with ministerial sepiratione, who de-clared that he was answering a call. "Are yon sare," was asked, "he wasn't calling some one else."
