A STATE OF THE STA

We spent part of last summer among the comply vacue bills, in "The Bethleheum" three sections German villages, built close-ity together, which, in spite of the steel with and great polytechnic school on whiched in their midst, have retained, more an almost any other American town, a quaint and foreign flavor. One clear Sunday morning in June, when the church-halls were rigging and the court the church-bells were ringing and the gayly dressed German girls were trooping down the shady street, old Anny stood waiting for as at the door. Anny was a woman of whose early days ugly stories were told, but the was now a "bakasrt," or convert. The poor old creature lived in a hut near the river, and was autoported by charity. Her one ocand was supported by charity. Her one occapation and pleasure was to go to church, where she always sat humbly in the back pow and dozed; most of the sermons and prayers, I suspect, being quite out of her

There was a peculiar, friendly significance her wrinkled face to-day. sht du heit in der Leebsmall ? " she ked, in the queer dialect of the Pennsylvania Dutch.

"No. We are going to church. What is the Leebernall ? be explained that it was a love feast o the Moravians, and that they had many Lesbamails in June ; one for the "great Lescomalis in June; one for the "great girls," and this one to-day, which was held by all those who wished to send missionaries out the Western frontier.

"But they will not admit us. We are not Moravians," we said.

"Ach! das machts nicts. Die door ist offen to alle kinner des Yasus (children of Jesus). Ya, sell ist alles!" she exclaimed, devoutiv.

The feast was held in the afternoon. A wealthy neighbor, the head of a leading Moravian family, repeated Anny's invitation. The meat, she told us, was not held macred like the Lord's supper, only in so far as it expressed the brotherhood and equality in

The meal, she told us, was not held sacred like the Lord's supper, only in so far as it expressed the brothershood and equality in Christ of all who joined in it.

That atternoon, therefore, we walked down the steep, slate paved streets to the square occupied by the Moravian churches and schoola. Here, nearly a century and a half ago, their bishop, Nitschmann, built a hut in the unbroken wilderness, and began the work of teaching the Indians. We passed a queer quadrangle with a mossy sundial in the middle, about which rise the massive stone buildings erected by the United Brethren. They are strengthened by huge buttresses and were apparently intended to last as long as the hills on which they stand. Here are the Schwester and Bruder houses, with their long, bare corridors and exquisitely clean little spartments in which the holy Moravians once lived apart in conventual seclusion, and the Gemein house, which was given up to the few married folk.

From one of these ancient gray buildings, a little bent figure flitted now out into the sunshine. It was an old woman who had given all the strength of her life to mission work in Africa and India. Now, in the helplessness of her great age, the church had opened this quiet retreat for her in which to await the last from her master.

She crept on slowly, step by step, keeping in the hot sunlight to warm her chilled blood. Death had the poor old woman almost altogether in his clutch; her logs were palsied and shriveled. But out of the wrinkies her eyes still looked with noble meanings. They told of nameless hardships, of indomitable patience. They belittled these comfortable, well fed lives of ours.

littled these comfortable, well fed lives of ours.

I noticed that the men and women who passed, looked after the little black figure creeping along by the wall to the church as the stiff necked Jews of old probably did on their prophets, who lived on locusts and wild honey and wore leathern girdles. They did not understand them; they did not mean to be like them. But their own chances for Heaven, somehow, were better because of these few holy people in the word.

I have a served from her dirty little wife and fareame old Anny, blear-eyed and ragged, order that is feast. Her life had no noble meanings; her brain was cloudy; her ideas few. The clearest of them was that even she was one of the "Kinner des Yasus;" that he had onlied her by name, as he had called that other Magdaiene long ago.

The church is a large, square building, with the straight pulpit and choir loft common in the early part of this century. One or two pots of roses stood on a table in the chancel, and beside it sat two or three ministers. The people came in groups, with a pleased look of expectation on their faces.

pleased look of expectation on their faces. They took their seats indiscriminately, and did not bestiate to smile or whisper, or to exchange a hearty hand shake. Our well-to-do neighbor drove to the door in her carriage, and came in rustling in a stiff slik; but she sat in the back pew beside Anny, who, for once, was wide-awake.

There were other richly dressed matrons, and many a lean, stooped mother, in her one good gown, who had stopped work for this one restful hour of the week. There were stout, sharp-featured business men. Heekt, the millionaire mill-owner, and meek little Jacob, the barber; there were young girls with soft, peachy cheeks, and old missionaries who had starved and presched for sixty years; there were a few carefully gloved and cravatted young men, and many little children with smiling baby faces.

The service was almost wholly choral, the people joining in the hymns and chants with derman fervor. Outside the trees rustled in the sanshine, and the fresh wind carried the fragrance of the gardens filled with roase the sinabine, and the freah wind carried the fragrance of the gardens filled with roses and syringas into the church. There was a prayer, fervent but short, for this was a meeting for the pledging of brotherhood not for worship. Then a missionary (every Moravian aspires to be a missionary, at home or abroad) told of the need of men at the West. ern frontier to preach Christ alongside of the drinking saloon and gambling hell—the first out-posts of civilization planted by the white man.

Vhen he had finished there was a pleas-When he had finished there was a pleasant little stir of expectation, and then profound silence. Eight or ten gray-baired men entered and as many sweet-laced plump matrons, each wearing a little kerchief of lace on her head and a white lawn apron; these are the last remains of the old Moravian costume. They all carried baskets of lightsweet rolls, of which each person from the ministers to the children in the congregation too one. Going out, the servers returned with trays full of mugs of hot coffee which were distributed in the same way. The choir chanted solemnly.

"I'll bless thee and thou shalt be set for a blessing.
Thus saith the Lord, to all around;
O may we in grace and in number increasing.
In faith, which works by love, abound:
Upon Thy grace founded in nove to Thee:
Thus shall we in doctrine, in word and behavior
To others of life unto life prove a savior.
The simple feast was eaten gravely, in perfect allence, with a certain sweet sincerity of brotherly good feeling, that was profoundly real and touching.
Then the cups and baskets were quietly removed, the organ pealed forth, and every voice joined in a bynn of thanksgiving.
The benediction was given, and we all came out into the shady street again. The sun was low behind the hills, the dew was beginning to fall on the sweet peas and tiger lilies in the little gardens. Old Anny hobbled away slone to her cabin. She might not understand the sermons that she heard, but she did understand that these good respectable people had recognized her poor endeavor to do right, and had eaten and drunken with her as a sister.

The aged maint too crept back to her cell to wait the summons, if Friend, come up higher." The young men and pretty girls strayed sway together. The jaded women went back to their weary housework, the children ran again to their play. But even the least child there had been taught that there is no scial distiction before God, that the rich and the poor stand on one level together as "children of Jenu."

"Installment collector of unpaid bills "
This inscription was painted in bold white letters on both sides of a carriage that stopped in front of an up-town house yesterday. It was a novel device, originating with a collector whose idea was to shame delinquents into paying their bills. He rang the bell of the house, and when a woman appeared he saked a question, with an expression of determination on his face. She shook her head, indicating that she was not prepared to settle her bill. "Well," maid he, "I'll have to drive around again." Woman-like she located after him as he was departing, and her eyes fell on the carriage with its give-away inscription. Her face paled with its give-away inscription. Women and Men.

From the Baltimore Sun.

In a recent article Dr. Romanes stated that women could read and memorize a page of a book much more rapidly than men, from which he argued that the latter are inferior to women in quickness of perception. The learned doctor ientions one lady who could read exectly four times as fast as her husband, and could then give a better account of what the hus-bend had read than he could himself. Some highly distinguished men, he adds, were his slowest readers. There will perhaps, be general assent to the proposition that a wor otes, relates and dismisses from considera tion twice the number of things in half the times man could. The nicety of her dis-crimination in doing so, the Epoch, however, crimination in doing so, the Epoch, however, dares to call in question. "An extraordinary blunder," says the Epoch, "is committed by Dr. Romanes in crediting women with a greater refinement and higher evolution of the sense organs." The reverse, our hardy contemporary maintains, "is most emphatically true." The epoch then proceeds to charge womankind with being more tolerant than men of coarse perfumes like musk," because their sense of smell is less scute and refined than man's." Experiments made by two professors of a Kansas university are quoted to show that "the sense of smell is in general much more deit cate in the case of male than female observers." It was found that men could distinguish an odor which had to be doubled or cate in the case of male than female observers." It was found that men could distinguish an odor which had to be doubled or quintupled in strength before women could detect it. The sense of taste is better in men also. Female epicures are rare, and the best cooks are men. Tea-tasters are always men, and so, it may be added, are wool-sorters, piano-tuners and the subtlest and greatest colorists. There are many excellent female singers and violinis a, the Epoch feels constrained to admit, but it contends that men can distinguish small fractions of semi-tones better than women. Dr. Romanes, while conceding that "in matters of artistic and literary criticism we turn instinctively to the judgment of men," yet holds stoutly to the prevalent view that "feminine taste is good in regard to the smaller matters of everyday life." to the smaller matters of everyday life."
But the ungaliant Epoch questions even this.
"If we look," it says, "at the average woman's willingness to accept such fashionwoman's willingness to accept such institutionable inonstrosities as Hottentot bustles, hoopskirts, deforming wasp waist corsets and ugly high hats, trimmed with stuffed corpses of innocent birds, we feel tempted to doubt the prevalence of sethetic taste among women."

The inartistic finish of the coloring of the The inartistic finish of the coloring of the faces of those whose deficient taste leads them to "paint" is also sometimes cited as proof of inability to make good use of a bad thing. The Epoch is disposed, therefore, to agree with Theophile Gautier that "women have the sense of fashion, but not the sense of beauty." The moral our contemporary has in view in its ungailant observations is that women being still "so far from perfection in what has always been regarded as their proper sphere," their champions are comproper sphere," their champions are com-pletely astray when they demand for them "the privilege of sharing man's labor in politics, business and the professions," With some qualifications the conclusion may be accepted; there is plenty of occupation for woman in her present sphere if its du-ties are rightly performed. A broader comties are rightly performed. A broader com-prehension of her present task would show it to be fully as important and honorable as any other. The disposition to alter the existing division of labor arises from an im-porfect comprehension of its value. Woman, the Epoch holds, should endeavor to educate her senses, her resthetic tasts, her emotions and judgment, with the object of improve-ment within the domestic sphere. It is thus she will best serve others and render her own life happy. In education the mental and emotional qualities that distinguish the and emotional qualities that distinguish the teminine from the masculine intellect should be cultivated rather than obscured. They are not delects but chargin, and constitute woman's set itremstible source of influ-

It is indeed pleasant to settle down to bousekeeping again after a few years of life in every sort of a hostlery, from an open face camp in the Adirondacks to a New York hotel. There are so many surprises in store for one, when one takes one's Lares and Penates, with all the appurtenances thereunto appertaining, from the dark solitude of the y storeroom in which they have pas years in sentiment and reflection You think of so many more things than you say, as you unpack the barrels of ham-mered china and crackle ware. All our china is real hammered, and all our crystal is the genuine crackie. Some of our fragile ware I hammered myself, some the truckman ham-mered, and some was hammered when the cask fell down the elevator well at the store room. I am a fair to middling light-weight packer, but I am not a genius. Consequently, it never occurred to me when I packed a bale of pressed hay around one tumbler to pack against the contingency of a fail of six stories. But then, I never stored before, and I knew But then, I never stored before, and I knew not the ways of the storage warehouse. I do now. If ever I store again—but—excuse these tears. I have now nothing to store. Nothing save only one stove leg. And it doesn't belong to me. It got mixed up with my things in the warehouse. But it is whole; hasn't a crack or flaw in it, and so I will keep it. I have no earthly use for it, but it does my soul good to see something whole about the new house besides the ones I made in the wall hunting for a hidden scanling with the wall hunting for a hidden scantling with a hammer and a picture nail. I found a scantling once. Probed for it with a gimlet until I got hold of it. Then I went into the next room for a hammer and a picture nail.

When I came back, if somebody hadn't moved the scantling, I am a heathen from Nowgong. I haven't time to chase a scantling all around the house. So I drove the nail into the lath and hung the picture. I nail into the lath and hung the picture. I am now one picture short in that room, but I plastered the hole in the wall so neatly, you can't see where it happened.

So many little things turn up as you uncover your long hidden treasures. I hear my sister weeping in the next room over one them now. She brings her pitsous tace into my lair and say, in a tone of a woman who is aweary of life, "I have found another moth." I say: "Why you found six vesteredsy; what do you want with another? She goes away wringing her hands. I suppose she found this one to bring the count up to the perfect 'number. Why do women—God the perfect 'number. Why do women—God bless them—go about hunting for things they don't want to find?

Only the other day while I was writing an "Ode to Washington," and was trying to think of a rhyme for hatchet, she called me down stairs. She said: "I believe there is a second to the control of the cont down stairs. She said: "I believe to the something alive in that barrel." down stairs. She said: "I believe there is something alive in that barrel." I said in my native language, which always comes back to me in moments of anger. "A-w-w-w". The idiom is untranslatable. Only men who have used it know what it means; to all others it is the unknowable. I stood on my head in that barrel to grasp at the straw and crush her idle fears, and may I never see the penitentiary, if a procession of starving mice didn't stampede up my back and jump off my waving legs. I did not come out of that barrel so hastily as you might suppose. My intention was to come out rather abruptly, but I checked it. A nail a foot long, which ran into my back eighteen inches, helped me to pause. They had to knock the other head of the barrel in, and let me crawi out that way. I am now a testotalier, but I had a nail that day that, for staying qualities, beat any "nest licker" that ever introduced fallen man to the james jambs.

DRIFT.

Here you ever listened, on a hot, midsum mer day, to the strange concert of varied sounds that crowd the air ? 1 don't mean the definite, particular sounds that singly strike the ear ; but rather that vague, inces sant, commingling of a thousand notes, that falls upon the sense like one vast chord, a deep hum or murmur, a cloud of sound, as it were. Ordinarily it does not enter the consciousness. Our hearing has become hardened to it, as of the ticking of the clock, makes no note of it because of its onstancy. It takes an effort of attention to notice it. In the city this cloud of sound i nore or less discordant, because mainly made up of human voices, or at least of notes struck by human invention. But out in the country, in the depths of the forest or on some lofty hill, where nature's voice alone is heard, the sound is a perfect and lovely harmony.

This seems to have struck one of the members of the Algonkin club during their camp at York Furnace this week. It is wonderful by the way, how contact with nature seems to impart the universal rhythm of movement to body, soul and spirit, and to start even the thoughts of man in a kind of rhythmic flow. This impulse evidently was felt by the Algonkin who penned one night these verses inspired by the sounds and sights heard by Sitting in this mossy dell.

'Midst these ferns where fairles dwell, Breathing summer's incense rare, Wondrous sounds fill all the air. is't the coving of the dove, Or the rustling leaves above? 'Tis perchance the treects' wing. Or the gurgling of this spring? Brooklet, squirrels, birds and trees And the merry burn of bees— All together strike the ear, Tell us what we love to hear.

Of the days they sofily sing, When no axe was heard to ring, When no plough as yet was known, When free Nature reigned alone. Here upon this soft green bed, 'Neath these disping leaves o'erhead, with the mounlight quivering through, Fainting all in mellowest hue. Indian youths that tale would tell Which a l maidens love so well; Here their yows were sent aloft, Here their sighs would mingle oft.

Spirit echoes still are heard or the lover's burning word, when the evening zephyrs blow Through the pine boughs drooping low. While the leaves of yonder bush Every fall is flect the blush tolowing on the maiden's cheek, As the word she heard him speak.

Ah! we love to be alone With the shades of ages gone, In the living past to dwell, Sitting in this mossy dell.

Thus becomes reality

It is very plain that the muses were on rampage at the Algonkin camp! only did the nights and sounds of the noble forest there inspire such effusions as th above: but the full moon also, never so wondrous fair and strangely potent as on the water or in the woods, put in her work. Probably homesickness lent its aid, and the two influences together must therefore be the correct title of which some of my readers will probably say ought to be "Moonshine." I am not sure but that I agree with them, so far as that is corecrned: but yet I give the rhymster's own rhyme I must also give the title he himself chose, which is this:

LIGHT OF MY LIFE. Pehold you shining sliver canoe.
That floats through the sky's deep ocean of blue,
Witn a golden star to light all its way,
And guide it safe to the realms of day,
As it sliently salis the dark night through?

My soul is embarked in that sliver cance,
And thou art the star so radiant and true,
The glow of whose love ever shining and bright,
My own lite's darkness turned into light:
The guide whom I'll follow my pilgrimage through:

If you can digest all that, such a big dose of camp poetry, and still endure more, I can't! Neither will I risk trying your en-durance any further in this August weather!

PRICKLY HEAT AND ITS CURS.

How to Treat This Affection Which is Now Rendering Many People Uncomfortable,

From the Journal of Health, Boston. Prickly heat, or rather rush, is a common skin affection, characterized by minute red points or pimples. These are about the size ot a pin head, and present a peculiarly annoy. ing, prickling, tingling sensation, with more or less intense itching. This affection is common during heated terms, and is generally regarded as dependent upon a swoller condition of the sweet glands, from the excess of work put upon them. They being unable to meet the demands, their products are retained and the tissues around them become congested. The affection usually appears on the surface to which hot poultices or heat-producing agents have been applied. The cotton jacket commonly used in pneumonia almost always develops the heat-rash on the parts covered by it. In some cases the cruption is short-lived, and subsides after existing for a few hours. More often it lingers for several days, and then disappears, to be re-developed on the next exposure to excessive heat. If the itching which attends it is very great, generally the patient affected indulges in violent rubbing and scratching, and as a consequence, the disease known as eczema is developed. Nays one eminent writer, a vast amount of eczema occurs every summer in this country from this cause, escess of work put upon them. They being writer, a vast amount of eczema occurs every summer in this country from this cause, especially in children, whose tender akins are more easily excited by heat and other local irritants. Among the poorer classes, living in crowded tenements during the summer, where, in addition to the heat, bad air, improper food and insufficient care of the skin are to be counted as important elements of the disease, the skins of children often present much more severe forms of disorder.

are to be counted as important elements of the disease, the skins of children often present much more severe forms of disorder, such as boils in great numbers over their whole surface, even large abscesses.

Mild and transient forms of prickly heat need little or no treatment. When the stack is severe and the itching is intolerable, it will be well for the patient to take a saline laxative, such as epsom salts or rochelle powder; a free action of the cathartics is desired. Cold sponge baths are agreeable; friction in the drying should be avoided. Relief is afforded by light clothing and the avoidance of exposure to heat. Hot drinks and excessive drinking and stimulants are iorbidden. The diet should be bland and easily digestible. Animal food may properly be excluded, and fruits should be freely indulged in. External applications are of little use. It is advised by some that toilet or starch powder be dusted on the skin frequently during the day to absorb the perspiration.

Indian servants for The Queen.

From the London Figure.

'The jubiles year has been marked by a curious addition to the Queen's household-Her majesty, setting on an impulse which cannot fall to further endear her to her Oriental subjects, has engaged two Indian servants, who arrived in this country unfortunately too late to take any part in the state coresonial functions of the past month. To Dr. Tyler was requested the responsible task of chosing the state of the pair in a Ma-sard after due inquiry he missi homedan rejoicing in the name Mohammed Bukah, and he comes with an excellent character from the mietress he has just left, the queen mother of Dholepore, who only consented to give up a servant she had found especially useful at Dr. Tyler's particular request. Mohammed Bukah brought over with him a magnificent gold chourr as a jubiles present from the queen mother of Dholepore to the empress queen he is in future to serve. The other servant who has joined the royal bousehold is a man who waited on the Prince of Wales during a portion of his indian tour some years ago, and both he and Mohammed Bukah, when arrayed in their full native costume, will help considerably to add color and novelty to the royal pageants in which they will probably have to appear.

When to Permit a Gentleman to Encircle Your Waste. Should a young lady allow a gentleman whom she is well acquainted with to place his arm around her waist while walking home from a party, it being quite dark? DEWDROP. If he seeks your love honorably, says

ADVICE TO A YOUNG LADY.

Emily Boulton, in the Toledo Blade, it will be time enough for you when you have so cepted it to allow him to put his arm around you. If it is only a pastime such as young men frequently induige in, then you certainly do not want to grant him a privilege like that. He may mean you no shadow of harm, but personal familiarity, founded upon no relation that makes it sacred, is alupon no relation that makes it sacred, is always unsafe. Many a young girl would have saved herself a life time of agony had she steadfastly repeiled these advances, however innecent at first their meaning.

There is nothing, my young friend, that you should guard so scrupulously as your own womanly delicatey. Brush the bloom of from a peach, rudely touch the waxen petals of a life, and half of their beauty is gone. It is impossible for you, or any other woman to from a peach, rudely touch the waxen petals of a lily, and, haif of their beau'y is gone. It is impossible for you, or any other woman to allow yourself to be caressed by your young men acquaintances without loaing somewhat of that purity and modesty that you should wear always as a queen her robes of royalty. You will be sure then to preserve not only their respect, but what is of far more importance, that of self.

Nor need this preservation of personal dignity savor one whit of prudery. You can be just as bright, as merry and friendly while saying by your manner, should it be necessary, "hands off," as you can possibly be by permitting these sentimental demonstrations. They are not necessary to the good comradeship which is all that should exist or appear to exist between you and any masculine friend until you are sure that you possess the true and tender love of the one man who has made himself your heart's king, a love which nolds you sacred, as every true man holds the woman he would make his wife and the mother of his children. And believe me area, if you are not set carrian man holds the woman he would make his wife and the mother of his children. And believe me, even if you are not yet certain that the prince loves you as you desire to be loved by him, he will not be any easier won should you yield to careases prompted by a passing mood, but rather repelled from you, for it is human nature not to value what is easily or cheaply obtained.

A Surgical Chipmunk.

From the San Francisco Bulletin, A curious instance of the instinct of some small animals in assisting nature to repair the damage done their anatomy by secident, was recently narrated to a Bulletin reporter by a well-known gentleman of this city. For some months a chipmunk has been on of the highly prized pets of the children of James Wainwright, who resides at 808 Tayor street. A few weeks ago the little animal, white at play, became entangled in a strand of thread and injured one of its fore feet. The injury was first noticed by the in-flammation of the foot, when an examina-tion disclosed the fact that a piece of thread was wound around the member and that the flesh was suppurating, Mr. Wainwright cut the thread off, but the suppuration con-tinued and a few days afterward the flesh sloughed off and left the bones of the foot exposed. It was now that the little animal developed his wonderful knowledge of the science of surgery. With his sharp teeth he amputated the foot at what corresponds with amputated the foot at what corresponds with the wrist joint. Several days passed, when it was discovered by the squirrei that his surgery was defective, and that not having made provision for a day the desh would not cover the bone. Again the little squirrei turned his attention to the wound, his first operation having proved a failure, and with his nose he turned back the desh and made a fresh amputation of the bone, cutting it off above the extremity of the desh, which was thus permitted to project beyond the bone thus permitted to project beyond the bone This time the operation was successful: the overlapping flesh became healthy and soon besied over the bone, making as good a job as could have been performed by a surgeon. The various stages of the wound were care-fully noted by the family of Mr. Wain-wright, and although the chipmunk has now but three feet, it is as lively and healthy as

From the London Times.

A return has been issued in the form of a Parliamentary paper containing tables show-ing the principal particulars of the original egends of the Imperiouse, Benbow, and Col ingwood when the designs were completed, compared with the corresponding particulars of the vessels as finished, for explanations of of the vessels as finished, for explanations of any changes, with the authority therefor, together with the e-timated and actual cost of the Imperieuse. The chief point of interest in this return is found in the statistics dealing with the estimated and actual cost of the Imperieuse. From them it appears that the original estimate was £554,821, and with value of masts, etc., and sees stores not provided for, counted at £13,832, this makes a total of £468,663. On the other hand the expenditure to September, 1886, the date of completion, amounted to £514,465, and the subsequent expenditure for alterations and quent expenditure for alterations an making good defects after crules, to £18,859—In all £91,672 more than the original estimate. The above figures do not include establishment and incidental expenses of the dockyards, nor the cost of the ship's armament.

Close Enough for the Purpose.

The colonel has contributed fifty cents at Decatur, a quarter of Birmingham, thirty cents at Verbens and thirty five at Besseme —all for the "rebuilding of colored churches destroyed by cyclones, "and when we got to Sheffield and an ancient darkey struck im again with the same old chestnut he turned on the man with :

"Bout ten miles from beah, sir."
"When did the cyclone hit it?"

"Y-yes, sah."
"Yes, sah."
"Very well. Was that church building blown down by acyclone or not? I want a straight and truthful auswer."
"An' you'll gin me fo' bits!"

THE MAIDEN IN THE PRAME.

Bight above the rocking chair Hangs the portrait of a maid, Who had sunny, golden hair And a manner somewhat staid. In the picture she's arrayed, Not in print or calleo, But in silk, inclined to fadeshe who lived so long ago. Dorothy was sweet and fair ;

By her name that Is conveyed, To my mind, for I declare,
By a name I'm somewhat swayed.
When the day was done she played
On the spinet, soft and low,
Some old song er serende—
She who lived so long ago,

You may be inclined to stare, And to doubt it, I'm afraid, When I say the maid up there, With soft eyes and silken braid, Long beneath the flowers has laid; My own grandmamma, you know, the was quite a belle, they she who lived so long ago.

She who lived so long ago,
grandpape, I'm sure, displayed
Great good tasts in wooing her, though
And his love she quite rupaid—
she who lived ac long ago.

NARCISSA.

Narcissa's mother called on our telegraph manager one day to apply for a situation for She explained that she camfrom Foxboro, was a widow, and had visited Providence to dispose of some butter and cheese. She said Narcissa had been "practicing in the Isolated Company's office," and added that "Mr. Van Shoot says she doose fus' rate." Something in the old lady's homely though sincere manner enlisted our manager's interest, and knowing that vacuncies on the Insulated Line, recently estab lished by Mr. Van Chost were few, owing to the limited number of offices, he told her mother that he thought perhaps Narcisa would do to succeed the retiring operator at Howgate. "That will be clever," returned the mother

"I sin't never had no chance to go nowhere myself, and I want Narcissay to git some poilsh onto her by going away from hum a spell." So it was decided that Narcissa should come down next day, and if she passed a satisfactory examination, go up to Howgate at once. She dawned on us bright and early. I say dawned on us advisely, for she was "as pretty as little red shoes," and wherever she went likewise went sunshine. There were five of us in the American company's clice, all young and single, and we were madly in love with her on sight. Oh! but she was pretty, and the little reque seemed to be perfectly oblivious of it, too, which rendered her trebly bewitching. She which rendered her trebly bewitching. She was what the country people called bright, but she was by no means cuttivated. While her speech ran less luxuriantly to negatives than her worthy mother's, it was faulty, and it was disturbing to say the least, to hear her ejaculate, "You don't say so," or "Dew tell," when we explained the modus operands of transacting business in a large offlee. But whatever faults of culture were hers, she was a vision of delight viewed as a physical creation. Such bonny brown hair with a tinge of sunshine in it; such a chin; such teeth, and such a plump figure! It would have been sheer blindness not to have fallen in love with her. None of us suffered from impaired vision, and we became enamored with one accord. We read of damask cheeks in our maturer years, and inask cheeks in our maturer years, and in-stinctively think of the bloom of youth, lify white and pearl powder. We are apt more-over, to revive that overworked joke of Sheridan's, and observe cynically, "Yes, her color comes and goes, comes in the afternoon, and is gone in the morning." But no one who ever naw Narcissa, but would believe in a damask skin. Her check was like a Catharine pear, The side that's next the sun.

The side that's next the sun.

I am afraid as I grow older and more conscientious, that Narcissa was not an expert operator, but we made a report to the manager which secured her the Howgate office. He was not a Morse operator himself, and trusted us implicitly. I suppose that if by any chance she could have been retained at Providence, we should have agreed on a favorable straider, whetever qualifications much Providence, we should have agreed on a favorable verdict, whatever qualifications might have been requisite. To be sure, she made an "!" for a "w" and she was so prodigal with her dots, that if the surplus once had been counted and checked against her, as I am told is now the practice on certain nameless lines, her salary would not have paid the tolls. But in our eyes those were but trifes in those glad years, and looking down into the pure depths of her violet eyes, I thought she was an angel, and I simost came to thing that "g k u" was an improvement on "t n k u," as she said it to Fred Ford who had just told her from the switch that she sent like a man. He blushed a little as she naively inquired how long he had read by sound. I am not sure but she said by pound; but I abated my admiration not one lots.

Oh! woman, woman, ye impale us on siance as long as tite! Had fate not willed it otherwise, we might detect the incipient shaft otherwise, we might detect the inciplent shaft lurking beneath the smile that wreaths thy saby lips or see it darting towards us from the dancing eyes of maid or matron fair. As it is, we dangle near thee, always—plerced through the heart, yet all unconacious how and when ye dealt the painless blow which makes man thine forever! That was a long time ago, little Narcissa. I wonder where you are to-day, and I wonder, too, if you are as happy and contented as you were once sweet and winning! "The years are swindlers," says the singer, "they make us old tesweet and winning! "The years are swind-lers," says the singer, "they make us old be-fore they make us good," but I hope you are not old, even though the years have crumbled beneath us sadly since that radiant day of meeting. Perchance, you are wafting light-nings somewhere in New England, but more likely you are married and have merry, romping children plucking at your gown to share their mother's smite. I trust that peace, prosperity and all good things surround you wherever you may be, and if you are as pretty as of old you must make happy even the placid mirror which reflects your sunny lace.

Pardon the digression, my res

Pardon the digression, my reader; but it is so natural to fall to musing that I could not help it. When you grow older and your brown locks or tresses are streaked with silver, and younger men and women are clever, you will find yourself induiging in retrospect just as I do. Narcissa's debut at Howgate was not marked by unusual brilliancy, but the distance from our city was short, and one of us was pretty sure to be with her during the better part of the day. Occasionally, to my regret, two of us were in with her during the better part of the day. Occasionally, to my regret, two of us were in attendance to do her work, and that was a state of things much to be deplored. Mornings and evenings, however, owing to the peculiarities of the railroad time table she was alone, and as she tumbled out our call and signed, the effect was demoralizing. The signal for Howgate was "Hw," and Narciesa favored extremely long dashes. The "H," generally came staggering in with moderate safety, but her manner of adding the "W," gave her call a weird, sad sound suggestive safety, but her manner of adding the "W," gave her call a weird, sad sound auggestive of a clime where the thermometer would be insdequate. Sometimes, in a fit of generality with her dots, she rendered it "peil." But our periods of depression were only transient, for on seeing her we straightway forgot her infimities of skill, and sat and feasted our eyes on surpassing beauty. Through one entire summer we vibrated between adoration of the straight way for the straight way for the summer we with the straight way for the summer we with the straight way to be supposed the straight way to be supposed the straight way to be supposed to the straight way to be supposed to the straight way to be supposed to be supposed to the straight way to be supposed to the supposed to the summer way to be supposed to the summer way to the summer way to be supposed to the summer way to be supposed to Narcissa and disenchantment, because of her peculiarities, telegraphic and otherwise. Fred Ford, who was the oldest of us all. peculiarities, telegraphic and otherwise.

Fred Ford, who was the oldest of us all, ceased his attentions one September day for personal reseons. He plumed himself on his accurate and finished sending. Visiting Narcissa in the alternoon he found a message undelivered, which he had sent in the morning. "This message was addressed to Miss H. A. Sherman, not as you have it—to Miss Hasherman," said Fred. "That was the way you sent it," said Narcissa, demurely. "Oh! I dare say," returned Fred marcastically. "Have you notified New York yet that you failed to find Miss Hasherman?" he inquired. "That would have disclosed the error." "No indeed," she replied carelessly, "the message is paid; I didn't fret myself about it." Fred was fot entertaining in the interval to train time, and Narcissa, I fear, pouted a little. Fred regretted his quick temper afterward, I think. Narcissa had probably been told on good authority that money was the objective point in the telegraph business, and the message being prepaid she regarded it a small matter whether or not it was delivered. Fred used to say, sometimes, that he was going to make it up with her, but when the war broke out he went away suddenly, requesting me to tell Narcissa he sent her his love.

Ned Jones retired as an admirer along in October after attempting thirty-seven times, one day, to get the signature "A. H. Okie" to a station on Narcissa's wire. She was anxious to obtain circuit, and to her, in common with a great many of her sex "O. K." was the signal to claim it.

Poor Neiddy! I think he loved Narcissa, but he was more fastificous than the rest of Poor Neidy! I think he loved Narciess, but he was more fastidious than the rest of us, and he "diod of a color in aesthetic pain," figuratively speaking, and relinquished her. Narcissa's orthography was delective, a point on which Billy Jackson was "more nice than wise," as she alterwards expressed it. In a note to him she spoke of "fenses" the "new mown gras" and invited him to "com down on Bunday and go gathering turns." Dear particular Jack! he couldn't stand it, and that Sabbath and many others have glided by without his giving his attention to the ferne at Howgate.

"It is no use, my boy," he said, gloomily: "she is a beauty and a darling, and I can endure her telegraphing, and all that, but when she attempts to loist her phonetic system of spelling on me, I won't have it. I am not a believer in phonetics and Narcissa is not for me. Woo her yourself, and win her. She may call you her 'dier' but yon are a philosopher and don't strain at guats, as you are fond of telling us."

This out of the five only George Hunter and I remained staunch to the divinity at Howgata. We were sworn friends and had been for years, but we quarrelled about National at languing that we proceeded into the subarts to fight it out. We compromised on talking it over, and when we parted we had promised not to visit or write to Narcham for six months. At the end of that time we were to compare notes and determine upon our fut.

All of the old force deserted Providence within a year or two and Naroissa was left behind us. But she long since left Howgate and her successor was unable to tell me as were also her neighbore af Foxboro when I inquired whither she had gone. There are four sober going married men, however, who must always remember Naroissa as a vision of loveliness and in whose foolish old hearts there are sometimes longings to view once more her lovely girlish face. Fred Ford is one of those of whom Mr. Aldrich says: maye:

A Perilons Postponement.

To postpone, when the duty for immediate action is clear, is always unwise. Especially is it so when increasing ill health dails for a resort to medication. Diseases of the kidneys and bladder are often of swift growth—always of faint tendency if not combatted at the outset. We have all-even these of us who are not remarkably well instructed-heard something of the danger attending Bright's disease, dubettes and other diseases of the kidneys or bladder. Let no one be festiaardly enough, to procraatinate if he perceives the renal organs to be inactive. Hostide's stomach litters are pseudiarly adapted to overcome this inaction, to sufficiently stimulate, without exciting the kidneys and bladder. Infinitely is this durette to be preferred to the impure and fiery stimulants of confinence, which prove the bane of unwary persons with a tendency to renal troubles. They are likewise incomparable for dyspecia, debuirty, fever and sque, and biliousness. To postpone, when the duty for immediate
