The Tariff Debate. While the major part of Congress was with Secretary Whitney on Saturday, witnessing the launch of his vessels, a nall contingent remained in the House in guard over the tariff bill, about which Mr. O'Neill, of Philadelphia, had a speech to make, that became the text of divers uncomplimentary remarks about Philadelphia and Pittsburg, and Pennsylvania evolution under the tariffs that have protected her. A goodly number had disagreeable things to say, and Mr. O'Neill and Mr. Bayne were quite overwhelmed in their championship of their state. Mr. O'Neill insisted that Philadelphia was far ahead of New York in manufacturing industry, and Mr. Bayne declared that the industries of Allegheny county were greater than those of all the Southern states that had representatives in the ways and means nmittee, which is the national tariff factory. These statements were doubtless true; but they did not have relevancy to the question of the good or ill of the Mills tariff bill; nor in truth did the suggestions of the other side have much more pertinency to the issue, though they seem to have considered the industrial troubles in Pennsylvania, its strikes in the coal regions with the oppressive conduct of the coal bosses there, and the strike at Carnegie's and the Pinkerton detectives there, as evidence of very great demoralization in Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the protection its coal and iron anjoys. The inference was fair and the ent was pertinent, in a debate upon the general state of the country. It may, too, have had relevancy in a question as to the policy of free trade or rotection : but inasmuch as the Mills bill now under debate does not propose free trade or anything like it, but simply provides a reduction of duty, which its friends consider that the industries of the country can bear without injury, it is not evident that the inability of the employers and employes of manufacturing and mining Pennsylvania to get along harmoniously together elucidates the issue; save that it seems to show an rreconciliable conflict between these two nterests and illustrates that no tariff protection, however high, will provide employes with all the wages and privileges that they demand It offsets the argument of those favoring a high tariff that it is for the workingmen's benefit only; and it is fair and effective in repelling this idea. If the protected iron and coal industries of Pennsylvania cannot give to their workent tariff protection that they may satisfy their labor. It is not for the laborer's sake so much as for their own that they want protection ; as their conduct proves and as everyone knows without proof.

And it is admitted that they are entitled to adequate protection. The Mills bill proposes to accord it to them, The only question is as to whether it does so. This is the only question open for argument, and it seems that congressmen should confine themselves to it and consider the several provisions of the bill. instead of wasting their breath and the public time in discussing the abstract doctrine of free trade or protection, which is not the issue. Those who advocate free trade condemn themselves in voting for the bill of the ways and means com mittee, which provides protective duties to an extent deemed sufficient to maintain all the manufacturing industries of the country.

Gladstone to Ingersoll.

Nothing finer in the line of good English and sound reasoning has been recently given to the public than the reply of Mr. Gladstone to Robert J. Ingersol in the latter's attack on Christianity. It appears in the May number of the North American Review, the periodical which published the similar work of the late Judge Black on the same subject. We reprint to-day a strong portion of it which will present an excellent notion of the strength of the article.

Mr. Gladstone proceeds about the work of demolition of the arch-infidel with a nevolence that would be touching were it not for the sturdy blows that he deals under the cover of his gracious language. He shows where Ingersoll assumes conclusions without establishing them, though demanding absolute proofs from his opponents; how he misquotes scripture apparently to suit his purpose; how he assumes Darwinism and Christianity to be antagonistic, which Gladstone declares not to be a necessary consequence; and so on through a host of sophistries. Mr. Gladstone's broad and deep knowledge of the scriptures, his vast reading and his special acquaintance with the early Christian writers make him an adremary splendidly equipped for the battle in which he entered. The tumultuous toric of the leading pagan of the day finds itself soon divided and routed by the ponderous army of arguments, led by the master mind of Gladstone. There is little left of Ingersoll at the conclusion of the article.

A Papal Edict. A decree has been issued by Pope Leo XIII condemning the "plan of campaign"and boycotting in Ireland. Neither of these weapons of protection against English aggression have ever been formally approved by the Irish leaders; yet they have been tacitly sanctioned by the silence that has been maintained in remard to them. Indeed, it is difficult to se what other means could be taken to how Irish disapproval of English tyrmy. The "plan of campaign" relates he collection of rents from tenants ho, having tendered what they deemed a equitable rent, and the same having on refused by the landlord, turned over he funds to persons selected by the Irish sectors to apply them for the purpose of besping the agitation mill grinding. Of course, it is not right that tenants should be the judges of the rent they ought to pay after a fixed rental has been made. But the land laws of Ireland have been so infamously unjust to the tenant that a measure like the "plan of campaign" obtained many vigorous supporters. It was a manifestation of an extreme in the other direction, and it might have been safely left to the good sense of the people to look to its correction. It was better than violence or bloodshed. Now the pope has stepped in to proclaim it by formal edict. It looks as if the Vatican had made a mistake. No matter on what high ground the decree is based, the fact that it is aimed against two of the most vigorous methods of Irish resistance to English oppression will cause Irishmen to regard the pope's action as an open notice of an alliance by the Vatican with the hated English Tories. The Vatican might very safely have left Ireland to fight out her own battle for deliverance from England, and such a course of action would have been infinitely more prudent.

Not as It Seems.

The New Era suggests that the Demo cratic party, as much as the Republican, needs the protection of the law to secure its primary elections against frauds; and it takes as its text the fact that, though there was no election held at Strickler's School House for delegates to the late Democratic county convention, representatives of that district appeared in the convention with credentials stating that they had been chosen at an election duly held. And on the face of it, this seems to be a point well made. But it loses its force when it is known that there were but nine votes for Black at this poll at the last gubernatorial election, and but seven for the local candidates on the Demogratic ticket. There are so few Democrats in the district that it is not worth while for them to hold a primary election. Any of them who can come to town on convention day are considered to be delegates, by long usage, and may manufacture their own credentials Their fellow Democrats in the district are very much obliged to them for representing it, and if any outsider objects, they do not press their informal claim ; and that is all there is of it.

THIS is a big country. While we are baking here, snow is falling in Minne Ex-Judge Robert J. FISHER, who died recently in York at the age of eightyand finally retired after thirty years' service because of his advanced age and poor health. He was very highly esteemed as a judge and a man, and was a good sample of the judges chosen under the elective system started in 1851. It would be well if the system had kept to the standard that the nomination of such men promised. instead of being switched off to the promo tion, in many cases, of miserable self-seeking is wyers, capable only in political manipulation. Judge Fisher was a very pure and unselfish man, gentle in his manners and considerate of others. Pennsylvania would be happy and far more highly stationed as a state, if her judiciary was up to his standard, and that of the men now living who adorned the bench when he ascended it. Of the judges elected in 1851 the Philadelphia Times says that Judges Allison and men good wages, they cannot claim be-fore Congress that they want their pres-Dauphin, and Kimmell, of Franklin, only are alive; and Kelley and Campbell, of Philadelphia, and Watts and Kepburn, of Cumberland, alone survive of those who were judges before the judiciary became

In the last number of the Jour nal of the United States Cavalry Association is an article by Lieutenant Frederick S. Foltz, of the 1st Cavalry, on "German Ideas on Cavalry." Prince Kraft de Hohnenlohe-Inglefingen, general of infantry, and aid-de-camp, on the staff of the Emperor of Germany, has published a book entitled "Conversations on Cavairy," which is a faithful record of conversations of the author with a certain mysterious personage described as a cavalry officer of the highest rank and of the greatest experience. This book of 400 pages has been deemed of great importance by military men abroad, and Lieutenant Folts notes as an evidence of the intense interest in the preparation for war that such a work should not only be brought out, but should find immediate translation into French. 1t seems that in another work the prince had praised the German cavalry, and in these conversations it is sharply criticized. "True, the Uhlan was the terror of all France, but as the French cavalry was still more badly handled than our own, that h saying little." The magnificent charges of the German and French cavalry often ended in a melce, the opposing mases penetrating one another and fighting hand to hand. The critic remarks that Frederick the Great discouraged loose attacks because they led to the "melee, and added "I want no melees ; the cavalry should charge in a wall." In short, this unknown officer makes it quite plain that in this alm at least neither Germans por French had the skill of their grandfathers. In seventeen pages of the magazine Lieutenant Foltz has given the pith of the 400-page volume, but it is largely technical in character, though having many points of general interest. For example, the martingale is condemned except for flat racing, and nose bands on bridles are recommended as preventing the horse from opening his mouth wide enough to get his tongue over the bit. There is an interesting foot note with relation to Seydillz, Frederick's famous cavalry commander. He placed his uncertain men in the front rank with the veterans behind them to urge them on if they did not charge squarely by tickling them with their sabres. "He appears to have bad an obstinate streak in him, for when ordered at Zorndorf to charge before he thought the proper time had arrived, he refused; and, when Frederick threat-ened him with the loss of his head, he replied : 'After the battle his head was at the disposal of his sovereign, but that during the action he insisted on using it in the interest of the king."

SAYS the Philadelphia Inquirer : "Another hanging and another vivid account of how the miserable wretch 'writhed and squirmed and twitched.' Are not these accounts disgusting? We have reached state of civilization in which those who would be unnecessary witnesses to such horrors are regarded as being possessed of beastly instincts. When shall we advance to the point at which the present pictures que terrors of the scenes in print shall fail to do anything but create disgust ?"

Yet many defend the death penalty by banging on the very ground of these same picturesque terrors," which are supposed to have a deterrent effect upon the murderously disposed. The taste for this sort of thing is of most venerable antiquity. The best of old Romans owned it when they gloated over the fierce struggle of the amphitheatre. Records of the savage instinct may be traced through all history and found in the peculiar pleasure with which Foxe's book of martyrs and other harrowing and blood curdling works have been read by gentle and well meaning peo-

fly. When we have advanced to a point where recitals of picturesque terrors will fall to do anything but create disgust we will be as far in advance of our present

THE auxilliary naval force provided for by the bill for the establishment of a naval reserve will be a very important though economical addition to our means of defense. It seems to be a very business like project calculated to secure for the govrnment command of a large body of trained men at a very small expense. The naval reserve would be a kind of ocean militia force, coming together for a few weeks only each year, for drill in the ma-neuvers of naval warfare and in the management of heavy guns and modern ordnance. The men would be paid only for that time and the rest of the year would be living as other sea-faring citizens, engaged in the coasting trade or fishing fiset, or perhaps some day in the far future cruising under the flag in foreign ports, where our flag once waved but now unknown. All vessels that can be transformed into cruisers may be kept on record at Washington for use in case of trouble, but as they ere few we must depend chiefly upon the navy we are building, and the proposed receive seaure at comparatively trifling expense a large force of partly trained men at home on the ocean and ready for service on call. The bill also provides that in building vessels to carry our flag in the merchant marine, certain directions shall be followed which will make them useful as cruisers. That is there shall be such con struction as will permit the placing of guns, the protection of engines and bollers and various other alterations necessary to transform the ship into a commercy de stroyer or protector.
