No Stroggle.

The assembly at St. Louis meets to ex-cute the well ascertained Democratic will that Cleveland and Thurman shall be the party candidates, and that reducsion of the tariff revenue shall be the party policy. There is little excitement consequently little enthusiasm, bese there is no uncertainty about candidates or policy, and no struggle. The awkward declaration of the Pennsylvania platform, demanding the Mills bill, will of menot be repeated. There will be better skill than this in the national convention, to express the party favor for the principle of the ways and means committee's bill, without committing it to the approval of an undigested measure. There probably never was a stupider declaration made by an intelligent state convention than that of our state convention upon the tariff, and there is no danger that the national convention will imitate its lan-

The Covenanters.

The general synod of the Reformed Presbyterian or Covenanters, has adopted unanimously a resolution reassirming the conviction held by them, that the constitution of the United States is a virtual agreement to administer the government without reference to Christianity, and that it would, therefore, be an act of disloyalty to their religion to take part in the government by casting their ballots. This idea that they ought not to vote for civil rulers, is the chief point of difference between the Covenanters and the United Presbyterians, and strange to say they seem to grow more firm in their opinion year by year. A policy based on an honest conviction and sober conscientious thought, commands respectful attention, no matter now unreasonable it may appear to be, and a body that refuses to sanction the constitution because it cannot consistently admit that religion should not dominate in all human affairs, may be smiled upon as behind the times, but should rather be praised for the bold honesty, fearless of ridicule that is one of the rarest of vir-

The criticism of the Covenanters calls for no new treatment of the much discussed and well accepted principle of the separation of church and state, but it should draw attention to the great change in the character of the people, which is in fact the measure and guage of the character of the government. When the nation was first formed the religious sentiment was strong in all the people, and De Tocqueville visiting America, was most powerfully impressed with the allguidance, so simply expressed in the national coinage so carefully restrained from further development in the written law of the land. Perhaps it was because of the deeply sacred character of this sentiment that it did not affect the form of government in a more marked degree, for men are not as a rule, disposed to talk much of the things they hold most sacred, and that influence their lives most seriously. However that may be, a traveler in these days would hardly be so deeply impressed with the religious emotions of the voting population, and the motto on our coinage seems a trifle too sanctimonious for the spirit of the age. The Covenanters have reminded us that we as a nation are not as good as our fathers who gave us our great constitution, and a government by the people can be no no better than the people.

Unreasonably Angry.

A correspondent of the Lancaster Inquirer did not like Col. Fister's ways when he was here working up a postoffice site; he complains that he acted as though he "knew it all ;" and he proseeds to relate the colonel's history, delaring him to be a native of Kutztown, Berks county, Pennsylvania; that he was a cadet at Annapolis; at the outbreak of the civil war he helped to take s gunboat over to the Confederacy; that he served with Lee. After the war he was a Republican in Alabama; whence he returned to Pennsylvania with a full pocket and became a Democrat.

How true this record may be we do not know; but it does not strike us as serving the author's purpose of showing that Col. Fister is not a competent selector of a postoffice site and that he does not know it all." It seems to show that he has had abundant opportunity to know a great deal, having been on a good many ides and in a good many places. And while here he talked to a great many people ; we are sure that if he does not know where the postoffice ought to go, it was not for lack of advice. The fact was that he got such a variety of it as to make it clear that every one in the town was not of one mind, and that there would be some one to damn him wherever ever it was put. He is not a greenhorn in this postoffice selection business. Pe knows that a posteffice location is an advantage to a neighborhood, and that there will be as many different opinions as to locations as there are different interests as to sites. And this interest is onducive to a selection when the people interested put their hands in their pockets and present the government with the site or witha part of its value.

postoffice is 'as near as possible to the centre of business, if a site can be there had within the command of the appropriation. People who want the postoffice located in an outlying quarter must present better ground and more of at a much cheaper price, and put their hands down into pockets and make a free gift to the government of alley lots to get them considered. Col. Fister may not know it all ; but he and the secretary of the treasury between them will know mough not to place the postoffice in a new quarter of the town, unless strong What Age Does.

Age is creeping upon General Sherman, with its confounded imperfections. He is losing his memory. He finds that he was invited to that Grand Army performance in New York as long as three months ago. It was so long ago that he forgot it. His secretary forgot it, too. The general explains that he gets so many invitations that it is not surprising that he should not carry them all in his head. Perhaps it is so. And he need not do it, if he does not make a row about it, when he thinks he has been overlooked. People who get invited to everything naturally, doubtless get to slighting their invitations; but it seems to hurt them all the more when they think that they are slighted. General Sherman is not tripped up in this Grand Army matter by his lapse of memory so much as by his manifestation of wouncel self esteem. It is hard for a man to be calm when he is kicked; and there is no particular neel for him to be; only he needs to be particularly certain that he has been kicked by somebody else than himself.

THE Century publishes a letter written by Horace Greeley to President Lincoln just after the battle of Buil Run, in which he saks the president to decide at once whether the disaster is fatal, and assures him of his firm support if so believing he tries to arrange a peaceful adjustment. He tells Lincoln that it is his business to ascertain and decide whether victory is possible, and sake him to write if such is his judgment "that I may know and do my duty." But if the disaster is fatal he urges the president not to fear the sacrifice of himself to his country. "If that is your judg-ment in view of all the light you can get— then every drop of blood henceforth shed in this quarrel will be wantonly, wickedly shed, and the guilt will rest beavily on the soul of every promoter of the crime. I pray you to decide quickly and let me know my duty."

The letter repeats this thought in several forms and is from beginning to end an carnest appeal and exhortation to do the best thing for the country without fear or favor. He says it is his seventh sleepless night, and while confessing himself a broken man calls upon Lincoln to meet bravely the heavy responsibilities that God has thrown upon him. He tells him that if he thinks it best for the country and mankind that peace should be made with the rebels at once and on their own terms he must not shrink even from that. bear in mind the greatest truth : 'Whose would lose his life for my sake shall save it.' Do the thing that is the highest right, and tell me how I am to second you." This letter is strongly characteristic of the man, showing at once his firm and ardent patriotism and constant effort to do the lighest right regardless of self, and also his haffit of taking sudden plunges from hope o despair. It must not be forgotten that this letter was written after seven alceptess nights and when greatly exaggerated accounts of the disaster had made it plain to Greeley that his oft-repeated cry of " forward to Richmond" meant a great deal more of death and suffering than he had ever imagined. For the first time he appeared to realize that a very long and bloody war was before the people.

The resuit has been that Mr. Harrity is stronger with the people than ever before. His good qualities shone out better from the background of malevolence that was simed at him.

Weary and Worn.

When the tired factory operative, the weary out-door laborer, the operasive the weary out-door laborer, the operasive to the weary or clerk seeks a medical recompense for expenditure of bodily force, where shall he find it? Could the resorded experience of thousands of workers he veiced, the verdict would be that Hoasetter's Stomach Bitters renews falling strength, stimulates the jaded mental powers to fresh activity, and relaxes undenervous tension as nothing else does. Digestion, a regular habit of body, appetite and sleep are promoted by it, and it is an admirable auxiliary in the recovery of health by convalescents. A fastidious stomach is not offended by it, and to persons of both sexes in delicate health who occasionally feel the need of an efficient tonic, the whole range of the pharmacopens and the catalogue of proprietary medicines does not present a more useful safer or more declaive one. It is also incomparable for fever and ague, rheumatism and kidney troubles.
