Fitter's Fitness.

The Republicans of Pennsylvania are invited by their managers to feel an enthusiastic admiration for the fitness of Mayor Fitler, of Philadelphia, to be ent of the United States. They may have some trouble in doing it, because of their ignorance as to the peculiar qualifications of Mr. Fitler for this high office. He doubtless has deservedly a local esteem : we believe he makes a good chief magistrate. He may make a good president. He has made a good ropemaker and has been a successful merchant. He has not been a failure in any place that he has been called to fill, which may afford to his warm friends a gratifying assurance that he will not be a failure as president. In the country at large, where Fitler is less known, there will naturally be greater doubt as to his Otness and less enthusiasm for his candidacy than in Philadelphia; but as he is hardly expected to come before the country at large, it will suffice if the Rapublican delegation from l'ennsylvania to Chicago is satisfied that he is a good enough candidate for their present emergency, in which they find that they have no one upon whom they can unite. They need one. Pennsylvania without a candidate at a Republican convention would be in a very novel plight; a state which is the head centre of Republican manipulation and the wheel horse of the party machine, must present a steady and united front in conventions.

Presidential timber is somewhat scarce in the Republican party in Pennsylvania. Neither senator is a very presentable stick : and Governor Beaver is quite too much of a stick. Mr. Fitler is about as ood stuff as they have, especially since Mr. Childs denies himself to the wooing embrace of the politicians. Mr. Fitler is not so handsome as Mr. Childs, perhaps, and the girls are not as fond of him, and be does not give away China cups ; but neither does he give away railroad franchises to impudent and importunate people who do not want to make an adequate return for the gift; and altogether he is quite a stiff necked and sturdy servant of the people. We are only sorry that he is wanted simply to serve a purpose of his party machine; for he would probably be a better candidate than the one if nominates.

Pension Legislation.

The Philadelphia Inquirer, in commenting upon the $80,000,000 pension bill just signed by the president, and the $300,000,000 under discussion in Congress, says that with gigantic river and harbor there will be no need of any reductions in revenue duties or internal taxes becouse there will soon be a deficiency ins'ead of a surplus. The Inquirer then proceeds to argue that with such evidences of prodigality and unwise legislation and reckless expenditures under Democratic rule "the people will not be willing to retain that party in power." This is a frank admission that all the great dangers of a national surplus are real and have not been exaggerated one shade by the Democratic party. Of course the assertion that that party is responsible for prodigality, unwise legislation and reckless expenditure is unworthy of attention. But these faults could not even be complained of if there was not a great surplus demanding care and offering temptation to scheming politicians of all parties.

It is not long since this same journal was attacking the president for his vetoes of pension bills and now it is startled and alarmed because he has signed a bill passed by a Republican Senate giving a great sum for pensions. Had it been vetoed, these would have been a great hue and cry over the injustice of the Democracy to the veterans of the war. The new bill appears extravagant to the Republicans because it has Democratic support. They had posed so long as the friends of the soldier that any pension bill, however extravagant, seemed sure of favor with them. But as soon as the Democrats show readiness to remember the soldier, they are struck with the reckless extavragance of the measures. The surest cure for reckless extravagance on the part of an individual is curtailment of income and that is what the Democratic party proposes and the Republican party op-

No Need of Disquietude.

The Republicans in the House seem to have resolved to prevent a final vote on the tariff measure at this session, and propose that the parties shall enter into the election without defining their positions by a vote on the pending bill. This is a natural course for a party to pursue, whose representatives are not united upon their policy. There is some difference in the Democratic party upon the issue, but that existing in the Republican party is much greater. We note that even that bold free-trader, Watterson, is able to correctly construe the Democratic position on the tariff, conceding that it is not a position for free trade, but simply for a reduction of duties to relieve a plethoric treasury, and doing no injury to manufacturing industries that are now

Mr. Watterson is a free trader in the abstract, and expects free trade to be the policy of the country sometime in the future, but he concedes that it will not come until it becomes the demand of the manufacturer. We confess surprise that one to rash in expression, and so hot in timent as Mr. Watterson, would conceds this condition of the tariff question, ain and true as it is. If theoretical free ers, of which he stands as a leader, are so harmless in practice, the business munity need not be greatly troubled the politician's agitation of the tariff ould not harm a home industry, and that free trade can only come when the home manufacturers want it, certainly there is no need for business disquietude over the outcome from the tariff legislation.
