The Height of Adem and Eve. From the St. Louis Republic.

From the St. Louis Republic.

M. Henricon, a member of the French Academy of Sciences, published a work in the year 1718, a larger part of which was given up to the past and present conditions of the human family. In the course of his arguments he proves, to his own satisfaction at least, that we have gradually degenerated from collossal specimens of flesh and sinew to almost microscopic specks in comparison. The dignified resilting of the less and since to atmost microscopic specks in comparison. The dignified position of the learned Henricon demands for his views due respect, but who of the present generation could be induced to believe that Adam, the first landlord of creation, was collegue. 'Eve,' says this learned M. D., "was a splendid helpmate for her glant husband, but was not nearly so tall, being but 118 feet, 9 inches and 9 lines."
