Under the boat at about the middle he has two air tight boxes, cae on each side of the keel and in these revolve two peddle wheels. When a blade leaves the water it does not carry a weight of water with it and acts always upon solid water, giving great pulling power. It is claimed that the direct action of the englas, the entire absence of the swell or wash produced by propulsion near the surface and the case in turning make this simple arrangement a very great improvement in etasmboat building. The same speed can be guined with lighter engines and the motive power has far better protection. The Doyslatows Democraf says that in a recent trial trip of a steam launch equipped by Mr. Bender all these points were sustained. "It moved through the water in almost perfect stillness, the only disturbance being the ripple at the bow. Two weeks ago, the officers took the model, a thoroughly equipped nickel-plated miniature steamboat to Washington, and, displayed it in the basement of the House of Representatives. Its working was exhibited before members of the Senate and House and naval committers, the admiral of the navy and naval officers, the superintendent of the life saving service and many others. We are justified in mying that all, the ingenious inventor of a new propelle for atsumboats. Under the bost at about to know how the vote stood, since since are supposed to be secret.

It is not to be smal, for instance, that the Demo-constant voted with two exceptions is his confirmation because of his minition of the conduct of a instance as they knew that two good ground for the that Payne's wealth had corruptly at his nomination against the better is of better men. We do not doubt because of the belief that he sturnly adapted to the diplo-tion, as he certainly is not. And this was the reason that d Republican votes against him. Let it was not Quay's reason. Nor was chairman of the Republican national mailtee and the close friend of Sena-Sherman, prompted to vote against treen's friend Halstead because of tendent of the life mying service and many others. We are justified in mying that all, including naval experts, who saw the model steaming along its artificial water-way, were delighted with it. Its wonderful pulling power was a subject of remerk,"
It is said that the inventor acted upon suggestions given by nature, for in the duck and goose the propelling power is similarly situated. for the men whom Helstead desed for supporting Payne, is fair assumption is that he voted lest the nomination as notice to the initiation that it must heed the sens-

Such a violadigious need of railways in Chins, and when the Wharton Barker syndicate was bailding its castle in Chinese air, there was beliding its castle in Chinese air, there was pleasant speculation as to the vast fortunes that might be made by Americans in opening up the Celestial Empire by railway building. But an article has lately appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, which is something of an eye opener. Mr. Wm. B. Duniap, who writes with an intimate knowledge of the subject, says that China does not need an American railway aystem, and he denies that there is any urgent commercial necessity for railways in China except on a few well defined lines intersecting the navigable rivers and canais. of the Pennsylvania senators, pre-tive as the postmaster general's se-on of the Philadelphia postmaster, con or the Philadelphia postmaster, intance, needed to have the gates down on it; and in the way of discuss to the admin istration, Quay voted not Halstead, although be was the sensitor's choice, and should under rules of the sensitorial ring have been except on a few well defined lines intersecting the navigable rivers and canals. He reminds the railway promotors that the empire has a vast system of natural and artificial water ways, and suggests that their energy could be more profitably employed in trying to replace the slow Chinese boats by swift steamers. He indicates a few points where railways could be built with a fair prospect of success, provided they were under European management, for otherwise, he says, the roads would surely go to the dogs at the start. He says that the government falls absolutely to recognize the commercial necessity of even the few lines he indicates, and all government nate is evidently feeling its oats; at depends upon the manner of Harrison is whether or no it. that Harrison is whether or no it out to be too big for its boots. certainly a growing popular that it is swelled too ad a resolute effort upon the part to out its comb would the sympathy of the people to go it. When the Democratic came into power four years ago, and in feet, all through Clarestend's term, the office senters cast longing eyes towards this office and many an attempt was made to out the man who has represented the government at Dreaden since General Grant's term as president. In going over the bitse book now, aspirants for consular offices have been figuring on getting this appointment. About two years ago a Demoora's came to Washington in search of a foreign appointment. In conversation with a surstor from his state, he said:

"I do not see why the man holding the Dreaden consulate came to be removed. He has been holding the place for tweive or fourteen years, and I understand that the only influence he has it that of Seanter Consecton, of Pennylvenia."

"Don Cameron the only influence he has I' was a friend in that consulate as long as he chooses."

There is a very interesting story in cornection with the appointment of Joseph T. Meson, of Virginia, who has been United States consul at Dreaden for so many years, He was appointed when General John A. Logas, was contaily removed to make room for Meson. The appointment was read out one day in executive seasion, and quite naturally General Logan not only became at once interested, but he vigorousty protested as well, and wanted to know by what right a friend of his was removed.

"Seep quiet, John," said the venerable General Logan wanted to know.

"He is a friend of his was removed.

"But who is this Macon, of Virginia?" General Logan wanted to know.

"He is a friend of his was removed, and the office for long while, and it is time to give some one size a chance."
