

public acts and his utterances to individuals who have discouraged the subject with him, as well as the expressions of his cabinet officers when appealed to for appointments, plainly indicate that he has determined to adhere to this policy.

Whether the term of four years will court from the date of a temporary appointment, or from the date when he received the advice and consent of the Senate and became permanent, does not seem to have been determined by the president, and when questioned about it, he has evaded direct and conclusive answers.

Postmaster General Wanamaker has at last tackled the stamp question and hopes to achieve economy by reducing the size of the stamps. This seems to be a very small and mean style of business for a nation so great and wealthy. The stamps now in use are barely large

Father and Son. Col. McClure notices in the Times the statement of the Record that Senator Cameron will not be a candidate for the Senate again, being tired of political life, in which he has only staid to please his father; after whose death he would please himself.

Simon dropped the Senate, but dropped it into Don's mouth; and Don, the colonel says, was the author of many of his father's most desperately fought victories, and he gives it as his opinion that he was the better politician; and he has an idea that Quay will put down his horns to him or that Don will run away from them.

It is interesting and new to hear this opinion of Senator Cameron's political capacity. The enigmist, translated into plain words, simply says that he was a better buyer than his sire; but the general idea has been that in this point the father had no peer in Pennsylvania.
