Powderly to Corbin.

Mr. Powderly naturally is not pleased with Mr. Austin Corbin's refusal to employ members of labor organizations, in the various corporations which he rules.

Mr. Powderly as the head of the Knights of Labor, could not view with complacency such a policy, but Mr. Powderly's opinion as the head of this organization is not as potent as it would be if his organization had shown a better title than it has done to public confidence.

Mr. Corbin was fought it and often won; its members have kicked in its tracks; and the labor of the country has not proven as yet to the country that it is capable of harmonious union, and has neither inspired confidence in its ability to respect itself nor made the men who seek to oppress it afraid of the consequences.

It is to the latter point that we direct Mr. Powderly's attention. As long as his Knights of Labor obey Corbin rather than him, and promise to abandon his organization to earn Mr. Corbin's dollars, he will readily see that he will make small headway in stopping Corbin's work.

It is essential for the starving laborer to be able to do it with the starving laborer. It is essential for the laborer to bank his organization dollars against Mr. Corbin's; to do which he must get the dollars; to do which he must get the dollars; to do which he must get the dollars.

It is the theory of this government and the proclamation of the politicians that labor should receive within its borders an adequate reward. This is the fundamental aim of good Democratic government, which would check the undue growth of wealth while encouraging industry and causing labor to earn a reward adequate to comfortable maintenance.

The labor organizations are distinctly in line with this Democratic doctrine in organizing labor to defend it against the aggression of the powerful interests that selfishly seek to get labor at its lowest price.

Mr. W. T. Lewis, who is probably the ablest of the labor leaders of the country, is today announced to have resigned his office as secretary of the Miner's National Progressive Union, because he finds such union impracticable at present, even among the single class of laborers with whom he has been associated—coal miners.

The superintendent of public buildings recommends an addition to the White House.

White House. His idea is that a private residence for the president should be built on one side of the historic mansion, and then, with no other excuse than a desire for uniformity, be proposed that another wing should be built on the opposite side for a picture gallery and winter garden.

A DISPATCH from Cheyenne gives an account of what is probably the last buffalo hunt that will ever be held in this country.

This Year's Elections. The current year is notably an "off year" in general politics. Only eleven states elect state officers this year.

The French explorer Gilliland has written to the Paris Geographical society announcing the discovery by Comte Telki of a Christian tribe in the very heart of Africa, about three hundred miles southwest of Abyssinia.

General Grenfell is watching the development with little anxiety drawn up in a line of battle two miles long and seems to expect some favorable result from a summons to surrender which was sent to the Chief Mad-el-Jani.

Dr. C. C. Mason, grand commander of the Knights Templar of California, died in Chico, California, on Monday night, after a long illness.

Right Rev. Monsignor James A. Corbin, D. D., S. T. D., died yesterday at the seventy-third anniversary of his birth.
