Collins, bearer of despatches from Gens. Wool and Price to Washington. Washington Union.

Tall Oaks from Little Acorns grow. About eighty years ago there lived in England a man whose name was George Gaelph, better known in history as George the Third, King or Great Britain. He was a tolerable kind of man in point of abilities—not, in fact, a bad meaning person. He would have made a better farmer, grocer or tradesman, than a King.

But he was born in the "divine rights of kings."

He was a descendant of William, the conqueror of England-William, Duke of Normandy, a bastard son-his mother being a tanger's daughter in Normandy, who surrendered her charms to the favors of William's father, outside the bans of the church. the channel with his retainers, and on the field of England, and George the Third, after he had been but a few years on the throne, bethought he would like to build a palace in this town of Kew. Parliament had been liberal to him in salary, and he could hardly ask an additional appropriation for the purpose of building a palace. He suggested the thing to his Prime Minister, who told him the matter might be done by a stamp tax, and a duty laid on tea of two pence per pound in his colonics of America. These duties the toady thought would more than be enough to build a hundred palaces. The king recommended the matter to Parliament, and Parliament passed a law to that ef-fect. The colonies refused to be thus taxed, unless they were allowed to send members to the body that passed the law, for the purpose of defending Revolution followed-seven years of bloody war was the consequence; but the colonies came out free. In their efforts they were aided by France. This war cost the English government some one hundred and fifty millions pounds sterling, or six hundred millions of dollars—a pretty good price for the palace of George the Third at Kew.

When the French officers returned to their native land, they began to feel a love of republicanism themselves, and they planted the seed in their native land. A few years after, a revolution broke out in France. They all took part in it; but through the wildness of the people, the republic which they had omed ended in the military—yet, so far as victories went, glorious—despotism of Napoleon. To drive him from the throne cost England about six hundred millions pounds sterling. This was paying rather dear for the palace of Kew. Within a few brief weeks a monarch of one of the most powerful nations of Europe has been driven from his throne like a vagabond. Half the world is in agitation, and republics are the general ery of the people. But for the palace at Kew, our own country might at this day have been part of the British empire, France a monarchy still, and the Times with reference to the Re-Awakening of England out of debt, comparatively speaking the Jews." [Lancaster, May 16-16-11] England out of debt, comparatively Kings, as the clown says, are "getting to be low company." Halleck wrote truly and prophetically

ome years ago—
"The monarch fears a printer's frown— A brickbat's range; tive me in preference to a crown, Five shillings change."

REPTILE CURIOSITY.-We have in our office a specimen of what is termed a "Texan Frog," but as this reptile, if a native of Texas, must have emigrated, being taken in, and forwarded from Mexico, he must be considered a citizen of that Republic, and we shall therefore call him a "Mexan Frog." This creature is really a curiosity. can Frog." This creature is really a curiosity. It with another, was forwaded some months since from Mexico, by Mr. R. P. Easton, to his family in Mill. It, with another, was forwaded some months since this city, and has not, since that time, partaken of any kind of food or liquid, existing like the Cha-meleon, on air. It will be left with us for a day or two, for the gatification of the curious, and the notification of "Hands off" will not be as nece sary, perhaps in this instance, as in some other es where we have taken pains to gratify the sight only, with a request not to touch—the Mex. can Frog" has horns.—Charleston Courier.
