First View of Jerusalem.

A writer in the Providence Journal furnishes the following impressive account of his first view of the Holy City:

My dragomen Hapaw and myself, mounted on fleet horses, had ridden from early dawn, hardly drawing reign, in my desire to reach the Holy City before sunset. We had left the baggage mules behind in the neighborhood of Ramla, to follow more slowly. Leaving the fine flower-sprinkled plain of Ramla, we entered into the " hill country of Judea," barren, desolate of inhabitants, and without grandeur. We stopped a few moments at the village of Abougosh, the former residence of the famous Arab robber-chieftian, whose sons are now in Constantinople, under the eye of the Sultan, explating the to which branch of his business he devotes particusins of their sire, and the evil power of the tamily is broken up.

Until this place, and a little further on, there is some slight appearance of verdure, olive trees apricot trees, and patches of grain; but after this, one comes upon scorched, volcanic mountains, on which there is no life. Yet even among these one may yet see evidences of the ancient system of ter racing for agricultural purposes, and this is the only way by which Judea proper could have been a productive land. It looks now like a land of curse, and not of blessing. We met frequent pilgrims going to an returning from Jerusalem, and two or three companies of Armenian merchants, richly dressed, with large retinues of armed slaves, and fine horses. The road wound through harrow, circuitous valleys, sometimes mounting up abrupt steeps, and descending equally precipitously, a road well fitted for those scenes of robbing and treachery for which it is so famous. One small village after passing Abougosh had rather a smiling appearance. It was nestled in a quiet bowl-like valley, and a little brook, which fidence. ran through it, nourshing a thick nursery of lemon trees, whose perfume scented the air. The people here looked handsome and amiable. One bright little musselman wished us a prosperous journey to " El Kudds," (the Blessed City.) for Jerusalem is a holy city with the Mahometan, and next to Mecca in sanctity. Here and there were the remains of towers placed at narrow passes, vestiges of the crusaders. The Hebrews were mountaineers, but unlike their Samaritan neighbors, their mountains possessed neither picturesqueness nor fertility; thei life must have have been a continual struggle with nature, and this may account, in part, for the obsti. nate energy and resolute egotism of the national character

We at last reached the valley of Elan, wher David slew Goliah. A ruined mosque points out the spot which tradition assigns as the place of the event, and the character of the ground and scene corresponds with the Scriptural account There is "the mountain on the side" towards Jerusalem where the Israelites stood, and "the mountains on the other side" towards Philistia where the Philistines stood, and there is the valley between them. There is the conrse of the brook where David found the stones for his sling, and the way taken by the army of the uncircumscised in their flight oward Gath and Eckron, was undoubtedly the ver patch which my horses feet had just passed over. d by faith and the might of the One Om God and then spurred on, for I knew that Jerusa-tem was nigh, though I feared to ask how near. We ascended to the summit of a hill, and a mass towers and minarets came to view upon an oppo-site mountain, and I cried out, "Is that Jerusalem?" "No," auswered Hapsaw, "but,"—. 'Is that serusatem : "No," auswered Hapsaw, "but,"—. 'He had hardly spoken this, before the long line of heavy battlemented wall, and the many points and domes of the Holy City burst to view, unmistakeable be-low me. I dismounted.
