He Wants a Wife. By MRs. s. NICHOLS.

He wants a wife, and she must be A model of propriety;
A brilliant pattern—wise, discreet, A centre where all virtues moet: Good tempered, just, and always kind-As warm of heart as pure in mind; Devoted, tender, gentle, fair; Accomplishments and culture rare; Low-voiced, refined, with every grace-An angel, half in form and face; A sweet, harmonious, charming thing, At his command to weep or sing. He want's a wife! we'll advertise it: Consents to wed—his friends advise it!

He wants a wife, with modest look, Whose heart is like a costly book, Which he is proud and glad to own— Which can be read by him alone: He wants herselender, too, and tall, And fair as woman since the Fall; And fair as woman since the Fail; Her eyes—it matters not the hue— He worships black—adores the blue; Her hair must, with her loving eyes, Agree in shade, or compromise. He wants her sensible and mild— In form a woman-heart a child : He wants a wife-to love him blindly, A partner he can govern kindly.

He wants a wife for neatness noted-For taste unquestionably quoted; With wholesome pride a very little; Of self-conceit no jot nor tittle; off self-concert no jot nor tittle;

A harmless, guiltless vanity

He'll not object to, it it be

A soft desire that he should praise her—
Indeed, in his seteem 'twould raise her;

Ile waz's her to have youth and health;

He wants her to have beauty, wealth;

He wants a careful, prudent wife. He wants a careful, prudent wife, To share the nameless ills of life-No will but his may ever answer— A downright "yes"—not "if I can, sir!"

He wants a wife to nurse his joys— To school his girls and spoil his boys; Make and mend their clothes, when able; To sit as mistress at ms table; To boil his conce, brew his tea,
To every household comfort see;
To hand his slippers, make his bed;
To softly bathe his aching head;
To be as fond as he is weak;
And in all things his pleasure seek.
He wants a wife! (poor, modest man,)
Built on this grand and perfect plan;
He'll take her, then, for worse or betterLet us devoutly hope—he'll get her!

The Emperor Napoleon III.

A letter written for the Home Journal gives the following description of Equis Napoleon, under date of Paris, Nov. 5th:-

The man is fearless, to a degree. I have often seen him-riding about, within the barriers, sometimes with, sometimes without, a groom. No one seems inclined to attack him. He has been to two of the Theatres since my last, and was well recei-ved. At the Theatre Francais, (it used to be so called, but it is now the Theatre National.) his "Imperial Highness" noticed a very pretty girl among the figurantes. Next day, the young lady mong the figurantes. Next day, the young had and her mother (they do these things systematically in France) went to St. Cloud, and the damoisclle has since remained there, with the Prince President.

has since remained there, with the Prince President.

will an any would have sacrified the provided when he tires of her. What manner of man is he? Louis Napoleon is not yet forty-four, and, though he has lived a free, and even dissipated life, does not look as old by seven or eight years. He is about five feet seven inches high—burely as much perhaps—and is not at all like the Napoleon family in features. He has dark hair, rather straight, and a thick black mustache, worn, it is said, to carry of the vastness of his nose! His face is oval-shaped, and rather long than square. From his knees down, he is out of proportion, as they are too short for his body.— He has a sort of green, fishy eyes in which there is no speculation. Indeed, his eyes quite spoil him. His voice is sonorous and clear. He is an accomplished man, master of at least half a dozen languages; a ready and clear writer; and good militar authorities assure me, that his work on artiller practices shows him well acquainted with the ar of war. His character is a compound of will firm. ness and secretiveness. All his stubbornness he is said to inherit from the Dutchman, (named Fayel, I think,) who, and not the ex-King of Holland, i reputed to have been his father.

The Empire will descend, it is said, to the heirs of the great Napoleon; so that the children of Jerome Bonaparte, ex-King of Westphalia, and now Governor of the Invalides and President of the Sen ate, will be next in succession, if this man does not leave an heir. Now Jerome's eldest son is a Red Republican,-by the way, he is the living image of Napoleon 1,—the same square face, well cut fea tures, clear olive complexion, straight scanty hair, and short, full frame. The cousins hate each other But Louis Napoleon will be allowed, as his uncle was, to name an heir, if he have not one by mar riage, and no one doubts that his aim as Emperor will be to do this secretly, and so cut out his re

Should anything carry off Louis Napoleon, there will be a new row, ending, I expect, in the eleva-tion of the Count de Chambord to the throne, as Henri V. The Bourbons have a party here—the Orleanists none. Henri V. would just be as pig-headed as a Bourbon always has beeen, and would ignore, of course, the existence of Louis Philippe. just as Louis XVIII dld not appear cognizant of the fact of Napoleon's having reigned, and dated his own reign as having commenced on the death of the poor lad, called Louis XVII. The Bourbons time, ladies used to wear just enough of petticoate to keep them comfortable, and these were kept in their places by shoulder-straps. But it is no un-common thing to see a weakly, delicate little crea-ture perambulating the streets with six or eight some of them thick and heavy enough for horse blankets-tied tightly around her waist, thereby heating the spine, and creating a pressure upon the abdomen, that it constantly applied to the back of a mule, would kill him as dead as Julius Cæsar in less than a month. Advise her against these things, and you are answered, "It's fashionable to dress so, and one had as well be out of the world as out of fashion." It's fashionable to kill themselves outright, and be done with it.—

We therefore advise those ladies who are willing to die for lashion, to adopt that course, instead of pursuing another, equally certain, but much slower—the only difference being that they were determined to commit suicide by improper dressing, the doctors have the benefit of their decline, and the an guish and anxiety of friends and relations are kept live for months, while in the latter case the blow falls heavily at first, but naturally wears off and is

The Wizard in a Fix.

BY PETER ENOORS, ESQ.

Few men have had their adventures better or more extensively published than Mr. Anderson, the Great Wizard of the North;" but I am in doubt whether the following one has ever met the public eye. My friend Pinto has related it to me, and others, at sundry times; and it his words are not truth embodied, I know not where to find that not truth embodied, I know not where to find that article. Pinto, it will be recollected, patronized Botany Bay in 1840, therefore the event narrated below must have happened in 1839; for but a few weeks elapsed after his landing in England until certain authorities there, in acknowledgment of his surpassing virtues, gave him a free passage to Van Dieman's land, and, ultimately, turnished him a situation under government, in that pleasant re-treat known as Norfolk Island. His triumphant departure thence, by aid of a catamaron, is matter of history. But to his fale of the Wizard.

Late one afternoon the steamer Lon Captain Wise, was making her way down Lough Foyle, in the North of Ireland, bound to the Clyde. The mist—or fog—was intense, so much so that, off the mouth of the river Bann, our captain that it proper to lay to—keeping as much steam on his craft as would hold her head up against the ebb, which causes a great current in that quarter. Our skipper had another reason besides the fog for his delay. He had undertaken to pick up the "Wizard" off the coast of Coleraine, as well as his traps which, of course included the 'Inexhaustable Bottle. Belore the night grew dark Anderson came of board, with one boatfull of his paraphernalia. An hour thereafter a couple more came alongside; but, at midnight, the fourth and last one had not made the steamer. At that time a strong breeze began to blow from the nor west, and serious fears were entertained for the safety of the missing boat.— Being pretty well inshore, the bell was kept con stantly ringing, and every means taken to attract the attention of the hoatmen; but the whole of the second watch passed without tidings, of the craft. As day broke the steamer struck lightly, but with sufficient force to arouse the passengers on board, who all scrambled on deck, and, with terror-struck countenances, inquired the cause of the accident.— Of course every one had made up his mind that the boat would sink, and every one looked almost dis-still in a condition to keep afloat for an indefinite Immediate peril over, a few among the pig-driving fraternity on board, on the suggestion of one of their number, agreed that safety could never be of their number, agreed that safety could never be secure so long as such a manifest ally of the devil as Anderson was, was affoat amongst them. Proofs of the consanguinity were at hand, and were nu merous and decided.

appointed when assured that the good steamer was merous and decided.

"Sure, an' didn't I see him, wid my own eyes, cut Art. McCann's nose off his face, wid a big azhur, an' put it on again same as iver!" 'It's myself seen him take a couple of ducks and half a dozen pigeons out of Larry Bradley's stom-ach. Devil sich a meal Larry ever made!" "Aye," exclaimed another, "an' sind halt a score of gold an' silver watches down through his head au' body on to the flure, widout hurtin' him a skirrag."

"Besides cuttin' the middle out of Biddy O'Boyle's han kercher—an' a brave dirty one it was to be white, sure—an' put an orange piece in it instead."

'An,' sure, an' didn't he make a young devil of his own boy, by causing him to stand on the side of his head, on nothin', wid his feet lookin' out of the windy into Jimmy Casey's pig-house!"

The sum of the whole was, that Anderson was the devil, that the devil had nothing to do on board the "Darry"—as the steamer was named for short—and, as Jonah's case furnished a tolerable precedent, overboard Anderson and his traps must go.— The deliberators were that kind of men who did not think twice in order to act, so they set about the scheme on the instant.

It was a harpy thing for Anderson that the mate overbeard the plot, for hardly had the means of defence been adopted by the Wizard, when the exci-Anderson knew this, and would have sacrificed life in his defence without consideration. Before things had reached any extreme—offensive or defensive— Capt. Wise took measures to secure the safety of his passenger, and, almost contemporaneously, the mis sing boat was descried at a distance. Only one man, however, was dicovered in the boat. captain ordered the steamer's boat to be lowered and manned, and the one containing Anderson's di bolical traps was towed alongside the ship. Three men were discovered in the bottom, appr rently dead, with their heads reclining on Another sat in the stern-sheets, with a tiu pail in his hand. This latter was in the last stage of exhaustion. The whole were taken or rd, and a most remarkable sensation was excited by one of the dead one, as with his last breath. shouting, as his body was laid on deck, the follow

"Come join hand in hand, like brother and brother United and happy be one with another, Ten thousand to one we all meet together, Next Patrick's day in the morning."

The other dead ones kept up some kind of chorus, collowing this effort, but it being something between groaning and crying, its purport was not well understood. "Dog on them! they're as fu' wulks!" said the Scotch mate, who was first to speak.

"Blast the hap orth but the likker's the matter vith them." was the coincident remark of a Hibernian. Both were right. With the exception of the man n the stern-sheets, all were about dead drunk. He being a disciple of Father Matthew, was perfectly poard, he recovered from his exhaustion. The poor fellow had been all night bailing the boat, in order to keep his tipsy comrades from being drowned!— His account of the affair—coming from a sober man—is implicitly to be relied on He states that, after leaving the shore, they got enveloped in the fog. Much effort was made to reach the steamer, but without success. At last is fellow boatmen and himself agreed to rest on heir oars until morning. The nature of their cargo was suggestive of "the devil's own luck," they agreed; but one was among them who expressed himself contented with that luck, if the bottle on y chanced to be on board. After some consultaion, and without the formality of a search-war-ant, one box after another was broken open, until at last the inexhaustible vessel was found. Brandy

The Richmond Republican, in the course of an article on Faahion, gives this valuable hint to the ladies:

"Within a year or two past corsets have been partially abandoned, but a substitute equally as destructive to health has been adopted. In olden wards she began to leak. The poor fellow in the structive to health has been adopted. In olden stern sheets bailed for his life, and could not have withstood the labor ten minutes longer had he not been rescued from his perilous situation and heart breaking occupation by the crew of the steamer's

The boat alongside was examined, and found all to the rowels. On being bailed out—which Ine boat alongside was examined, and found tull to the rowels. On being bailed out—which was rather a difficult process—the bottle was found neck downwards, and the mixed liquors rolling from it like a mountain spring. The boat itself was as sound as a bell, but the enormuous quantity of liquors which had escaped caused the whose night's work was so severe, to imagine the boat leaking.

After being taken on board, ninety-six gallons and four quarts were decanted from the bottle, and t was only after the fumes of the liquor had begun to affect the spectators that the professor of the black art placed his veto on a further supply. The above story is as true as the other adventures of Pinto, and were any further proof of its veracity wanting—which is not the case—it may be discovered on paying a visit to Mr. Anderson, the celebrated "Wizard of the North."

THE FUR TRADE OF NEW YORK .- The Journa of Commerce states that the furriers of New York are beginning to do a pretty brisk tall business, and furs will be very generally worn during the coming winter. Some of the best descriptions bring extravagent prices—150 or $200 not being unfrequently given for a set. The stock of furs now in New York is supposed to be worth not far from $2,000,000. The largest traders have stock on hand ranging from 50,000 to $100,000.
