Helen stole softly into the cottage, begging the use of my writing desk, and all its contents, which were freely granted. We smiled quietly on each other as she departed, knowing well that she was about to pen a letter to her lover, from my cottage. But the smile of Louise was touched with scorn, she had long since been initiated into the mystery of the one grand passion, and could afford to look down upon the trembling happiness of the novice.

My Childhood Home.
I'm dreaming of my childhood home, that sweet and sunny spot.
And fancy pictures vividly those scenes my heart
I had my father's arms again, and see my mother's smile,
As she listened to the joys about the nursery laughter
How oft I'm roused in morning days, beside that nursery stream.
And with childish wonder gaze to see those sparkling waves
Or set me down beneath the shade of some wide spreading tree.
Nor thinking I might ever leave that spot so dear to me,
Nor dreaming of the future, how could I look for more.
For now as a stranger was around our household hearth,
In that happy, happy home of mine—that paradise on earth.
O give me back my childhood home—for ever with me
I'll last.
"Till I can meet thee, dearest thoughts of those glad days of yore.
Then give me back my childhood home, those loved ones
I'll last.
But no, no—that cannot be—death's relentless
hand
Hath entered there, and snatched those few which bound our household band.
A fancy will 'er be found, which thought on earth can never be.
For a father's gentle voice is hushed, a sister's smile is still'd,
O must it be that we on earth no more may meet
That never to be hallowed spot will those dear ones return?
Yet faith and love do whisper of one that promised given,
When we shall be united all—on one in Heaven.

THE BELOVED SMILE.
BY WINNIE WOODFERN.

It was a beautiful summer's day, when the sun shone out just hot enough to make the little stream under the black cherry tree, and the daisies in the meadow, and the yellow birds sang in the feathery branches of the larch, as if they were thanking their Maker for giving them so beautiful a home, and for listening so admiringly to their delicious music.

Breezes stirred now and then, as if in search of something lost in the stately trees, but returned to their covert too lazy to make an effort to stir them—and it was beyond our pleasant home, the blue, bright, glorious sea was heaving and swelling with a gentle motion, as if it asked us to glide swiftly over its waters, in the bonny boat that bore my own name upon the stern, the flag tipped mast, and the fair oars.

The tide was slowly going out, and the waves surged up against the sea wall with a low music no other voice could make, while from the vessel anchored far out in the harbor, the cheery voices or merry songs of the sailors, floated over to mingle with its murmuring tones.

Was it the sky of dazzling blue, flecked here and there with a white fleecy cloud like the wing of a snow bird—and in the chequered light and shade of the stony seat beneath the cherry tree, with the subdued radiance it cast upon our faces—and the wondrous beauty of the ocean before us, or the half heard music of our own young hearts that still us into that state of divinely calm repose, and made us feel as if I know not then, I know not now, what thoughts were working in the hearts of my companions, though I fancied I detected a faint shadow of sadness in the beautiful eyes of Louise, but my own heart and soul were the recipients of a pleasure seldom understood or felt—at my lips was a golden smile, and I quaffed it greedily, tho' silently.

How vividly that scene comes before me now!

The little seat—the grey rock profusion around it—the three girls in their young fresh beauty—Louise, graceful and fascinating, with her fair English face, brown hair, and soft poetic eyes, and in the center, and clearest gray—Helen, softly featured, blue eyed and fair haired, with winning childish ways, and a sweet, clinging dependence; that won so many hearts—Mary, fair as her sister, but more stately, more dignified, more self-reliant—and I, at the feet of the trio, gazing first up in their faces, and then out upon the bounding sea—and a deep humming of the orphans sisters, and the soft bright hues of the lawn dresses Louise and I both wear, form a pleasing contrast, which is heightened by the dusk green of the branches behind us, and the cold grey of the granite seat, and on the left, half hidden by the peach and poplar trees that shade its rustic portico, the deep brown cottage stands, with its canopy of green vines and purple bunches of grapes, its blush roses, and morning glories, and honeysuckles—and sweetest and saddest of all, its little garret beneath the parlor window, where, beneath a sod heavy with violets and daisies, rests the dearest dreamt of girl who has ever known—my little dog Jip!

All this—the dun shadows and the beaming light—the girlish faces and the graceful forms—the turf which has been wet with so many bitter tears, and the home I have left behind me forever, form a picture which I can never, never forget!

We were not quite unknown or unrecruited for out of the circle of our friendship. Three of us already yielded the pen—Louise was quite well and favorably known to the reading public. Helen was following fast in her footsteps, and even I, had received some encouragement from those who had perused my productions, and sundry favors from young and ardent followers of literature, who "rejoiced to worship the new star," and do several other things which my young heart deemed vastly fine.

Prospective laurels rested on three heads of the four—only the stately Mary was spared the pains as well as the joy of our responsible situation.

In fancy, I, at least, saw myself concerning all hearts by my written eloquence—saw myself a second Corwin—a crowned, triumphant and beloved. A thing which many of my profession have dreamed, or ought to dream. Peace to them! May they look in a better humor than I have done!

I walked at Mary's, as she met my frequent glances with a benignant smile—

FASHION AND DISEASE.

The editor of the Scalpel, in a very interesting article, in the August number of that excellent work, on the crippled condition of the lungs, in woman, makes the following sensible remarks, which we commend to the serious attention every female.

"Only look at the position of a fashionably-dressed woman, sitting in her rocking chair, embroidering; see the approximation of her arms, and the bent neck and body. The chest containing the lungs has to sustain the whole weight of the head and arms; they hang upon it almost like pieces of dead flesh; the intestines are forced down upon the womb, and the great blood vessels that supply the limbs are compressed. There is the beautiful spine superbly arched by the Great Artist, with its exquisitely arranged and graceful curves, to bring the centre of gravity between the feet, the very line of beauty, its unmatchable and unequalled elastic substance between each bone, to take the weight of the breast and throat, with beautiful and grand muscles on the back to keep back the shoulders—the whole woman—a dream of Eden when the world was young; and look only look at the best results of fashion—the Great Heavens' Spirts of Guido and Raphael, do ye behold her! Shades of Hunter and Bell, do not your bones rattle in your graves at the spectacle! Such respiration with the lungs poisoned and irritated in the atmosphere of the parlor, and the rank and stinking smell of a 'magnificent' velvet carpet, filled with scented flowers, and the perfume of the flowers, and the light of heaven shut out by blinds and curtains, will stifle three quarters of the natural demand for air, exercise and food, it will congest the lungs and eyes, and the colorless blood vessels that nourish the rosy or pellucid vessels of the eye and give it its sparkling lustre, and the skin its fairness, make the fingers and hands take away capacity and muscular power to hold up the head and keep the shoulders back, constipate the bowels, by robbing them of their secretions and the constant motion imparted by a full supply of air to their muscular coat, and make the whole woman a mere half-livified machine, fit only to give the sickly replies of mental insanity to the insupportable trade she expects to receive from the male folk that sits before her. This is the actual condition of almost every fashionable woman in the city, and it is brought about mainly by want of exercise; she is unable to take it from the construction of her dress, and the slavish adherence to fashion; indeed she does not dread of its necessity, she feels the wretched lethargy that presses with loaden weight upon her soul; she knows that the glad earth is full of music of love and happiness, her mother's instincts tell her she ought to share them, but a monotonous conventionalism threatens her with ostracism if she allows a ray of nature to warm the general atmosphere into life. Great God! when I look upon the beautiful and fair faces of my countrywomen, as they move before me like so many automata, under the iron despotism of that bloodless and sickly thing called fashion, my soul is sick at the spectacle, and I am glad to escape into the seclusion of my own home, to breathe the fresh air of heaven, and to feel the breeze of the Creator, and to listen to the uncheered murmur of the winds, and the leaping of the dancing rivulet; and when I return to the duties of life, I look from my window upon the little spot of verdure a city prison allows me, and I hear the murmur of the bee, and see the little humming-birds, and I feel as if I were a creature, my heart yet leaps with childish delight as the lovely little creature swings upon the branches; I return to my task, and I feel that if I had the eloquence and benevolence of Christ, I could spend my life in no better cause than attempting her instruction in the laws of her being, and showing her how to love and truth love and simplicity are inseparably connected with the sublime science of life.
