SHE COULD NOT HELP IT.

AN INCIDENT OF ACTUAL LIFE. BY LAWRENCE LABREE.

Lizzie could not help it. She was young, and guileless, and ignorant of the world's ways; and therefore she could not help it when Gordon, a gay and dashing fellow, threw himself at her feet, and made the most earnest declarations of love to her. She shed tears, to be sure; and she was a deal surprised at the audacity of the man; but then she readily forgave him, and when he rose to his feet, and drew her to his side, she could not help it if her cheek reclined softly against his, or if her sweet lips were just parted to receive the chaste satutation of love.

Lizzie could not help it, when she promised to meet her lover that evening. But she did meet him, and they walked in silence under starry skies, and inhaled the perfume of sweet clover ; and he took her hand in his, and in the presence of that shining host, swore to love, cherish and protect her forever-that she should be his, and he hers-that nothing could them sever; and thus they became one heart, indivisible and inseparable. But Lizzie's parents were proud and wealthy, and Gordon had nothing but his industry and honest labor to rely upon. He would not have dared to propose the hand of Lizzie Grey, knowing the distinction between their different positions; but how could he refrain from a declaration, after having met her several times, and reading her heart, as it were, and looking deep down into the mystery of those blue eyes? How could he, under the influence of that calm summer even-how could he, under such influences, help pouring forth his soul to the object of his adoration, and vow to her again and again how much he loved her? And certainly when he drew her fondly to his side, and her heart was throbbing with tenderness, like a mother dove, and he pressed her cheek to his, and imprinted on her cool and placed brow a kiss, there was no harm done and no sin committed, though an angry father might storm and a proud ounded vanity were lovers-fate had brought them together-neither of them could help it, and hey were both believers in destiny; and therefore, though they both saw their error in falling in love, passion and feeling overruled their better judgment, and they would not pause to reflect upon the consequences of an ill-assorted union, where there was no probability of winning the consent of either of the parents. It is a misfortune for a poor young man to fall in love with the daughtlr of wealthy parents, and proud ones, too.

Mr. Grey, the father of Lizzie was merchant of wealth and standing, and his opinion on mercantile matters was considered as sound as the slaw and the pro-His life had been one of continued success, from the time he first entered himself as a clerk to Henchman, Clark & Co., green from the country to the ripeness of middle age. Through a marriage with the daughter of the principal of the firm, he became a partner, and finally succeeded to the entire husiness

But Mr. Grey was thoroughly a practieal man. There was no romance in his constitution. A dollar was just a dollar, with the interest added. He was a quiet, sober man, who walked through the world with the same face ever on; nor was ever the least shadow of passion seen to flit over it. He never showed anger, and but seldom smiled. He looked like a man that owed the world a bitter hatred, and was pursuing it with relentless determination. Even in his own house, the sternness of his features never relaxed; yet in a practical sense, he was one of the mildest and most indulgent of husbands and fathers; and as far as money could be of avail, there was not a whim of his wife or his daughter that was not gratified. Strange man! how was it possible that he could confer hapiness on a home? Mrs. Grey was a passive wife. It had been a marriage of interest at first. Her affections had never been solicited, and as she had never found any occasion to love, she expected none from her husband. Strange prostitution of human naturesuch a marriage!

Mr. Grey was a perfectly heartless man. He had forgotten his own origin, and how, from small beginnings, he had succeeded in life until he had attained all that his ambition could seek or crave for-the position of the leading merchant of the city, and the reputation of being the wealthiest man in it. He was incapable of emotion as the anvil that receive the blows of the smith's hammer, and as cold and unyielding as inexorable fate, or the wheels of the Hindoo Juggernaut. Mr. Grey was also a member of a church, and was as regular every Sabbath at his devotions, as the day came round. But in his reli gion, Mr. Grey was the same as in everything else. There was no enthusiasm in He seemed to be religious rather as a duty than as a love-just as though the good God could not see into his heart hrough the thick veil of hypocricy which he had thrown over it-just as though he could hide himself away in the garden from that Omnipresent eye, or cover his shame with fig leaves-just as though he could hide from himself, where the searching scrutiny of his own conscience could not sit in judgment upon him. There are a great many just such Christians as Mr. Grey, who are every day met in society, and who live and die un-fine dresses, and their carriages, and their and he asked permission to marry her.-Such was Mrs. Grey-almost as heart- of his situation, John knew enough of Mr. less as her husband. Now, certainly, Grey's disposition to understand that there beside self. It is a dreadful pity that hearts must wither and die like imprisoned birds-locked within cold walls, and guarded so closely lest one honest emo- with Mr. Grey was Sunday, and the whole tion shall steal from them—that the fresh when we were born, should wither with of the Bramins, which prompt them to inflict self torture upon their persons, of the he wrath of their deities. God bless the man who can live a long as fresh as infancy, in spite of all the adversities and broken friendships of life. As for Lizzie Grey-she was neither like cheerful, laughter-loving creature, sprightips as sweetly as did ever melody on the der, like that of a mating dove-it fell upman's heart in it-it fell upon the ear so tenderly, like the strange music one somethe balmiest summer zephyrs over the Mr. Grey, these twentyyears since a has bestrings of the Æolian harp-it awoke the come a crabbed old man, and will probably tenderest of emotions, and made the eyes try to buy his way into heaven by leaving glisten with an unwanted expression of at his death, afew thousand dollars to tract sympathy. It was perfection, and must and missionary societies. have been composed of all heavenly harnonies. Oh, that music could have floated upon the ear of Time, to become mute writ. and voiceless forever, unless the angels in heaven became jealous of its sweetness, and petitioned that it be added to that immortal choir that keep continual praise around the throne of Him who is Eternal! What wonder that Gordon loved her!

John Gordon was a clerk for Mr. Grey. He had been in that position for four years, and had proved himself intelligent, active and trustworthy-three qualities which Mr Grey appreciated, though he took particuar pains not to show Gordon the fact .-The young clerk was admitted on terms of familiarity into the family, not out of any respect that was entered for him, but mere ly on sufferance, the same as sometimes the ady suffers the cat to come into the parlor for a moment. He was permitted to sit in the company with Lizzie, and even to walk out with her; because how could the wealthy Mr. Grey, even for a moment, suppose that his clerk, with a salary of one ousand a year, would presume to make love to his daughter, or that Lizzie could ever be so foolish as to encourage any familiarity on the part of a young man whose prospects in life depended upon his salary. Mr. Grey forgot that he was once a clerk on a salary himself. But John Gordon could never become William Grey. John had a heart, as fresh and as pure as the summer air of his country home. Neither William Grey nor Mrs. Grey could understand it; but Lizzie could, and did, and when John wickedly fell in love with her, and foolishly told her, poor Lizzie felt so tenderly for him, that she could not but respond, and so they fell to loving eachother as hard as they could, without considering the consequences, and just as though it would be the proudest act of Mr. and Mrs. Grey's lives to give their daughter away to a poor young clerk. How sadly people often get disappointed.

And now we are coming to the saddes part of our story, though it must be told, for it is not one of fiction, as many of our readers may remember, if they will take the trouble to trace their memories, back for the space of twenty-five years.

Well, John Gordon loved Lizzie Grey with the free and generous soul of honest manhood. There could be no sin in lov ing one so pure and confiding. We will not say that he did not have some compunctions when he reflected upon the difference in their positions—he a clerk upon a small salary, and she the heiress of immense fortune. He sometimes wished she were a poor girl—he would love her just as well; for he knew that money was the god of Mr. Grey, and he could scarcely believe that he would consent to bestow his daughter upon one in his humble position. But such thoughts made him blush and he would repel them with indignation. for he knew his love was honest and unselfish, and he remembered, too, that Mr. Grey was once as poor as himself, and he felt that there were yet chances for himself to raise by. He could not help his love, and there was no use to struggle against it; nor could Lizzie help loving him. they were mutually bound up in each other, and love was as necessary a part of their exist ance as the air they breathed; and so the happy hours they spent together were full of rosy clouds, and the air was balmy with sweetness, and trembling full of music.-It was all fairy land to them, and they felt umortal. For many months John Gordon and Lizzie Grey thus loved each other, until at length he mustered courage one day to speak to Mr. Grey on the subject. He did not expect that the farther would be surprised at him for doing so, for Lizzie and him had been so long on intimate terms, that he naturally enough supposed that der the false impression that they have their relationship to each other was perdone their duty conscientiously, both to feetly understood by both parents. Cer-God and man-men who belong to the tainly it was reasonable enough to infer church from selfish principles only, deem that two young persons like themselves that two young persons like themselves could not meet every day in the year, and so there was no harm in speaking to Mr. Grey on the subject, particularly as they both imagined that could be still happier if they could interest of the above in every variety, including that two young persons like themselves could not meet every day in the year, and walk out evenings without getting attached to each other; and so there was no harm in speaking to Mr. Grey on the subject, particularly as they both imagined that they would be still happier if they could interest of the above in every variety, including to retail, also obage or negetly including or retail, also obage or negetly including to retail, also obage or negetly including or retail, also obage

It was a fashionable day in the counting room John told the church, where ladies went to show their cold Mr Grey how he loved his daughter, servants; and where they listened to a but Mr. Grey only answered him with a handsome and eloquent preacher, who sneer, and told him the thing was impossireceived a salary of six thousand dollars ble, and bade him think no more of the year, besides house-rent and perquisites. subject, for that it would be at the hazard neither of these two persons could have was no hope left for him unless he took enjoyed life only as an animal enjoys it; Lizzie against the consent of her parents, and yet perhaps it was not their fault. and from a home of luxury and affluence Mrs. Groy might have become a different to one of humble pretensions; and he woman had she been loved by the man would not do that for the world-not for who wedded her-had she been warmed Lizzie's sake, for he loved her too much to into life instead of frozen into ice. And impose upon her any sacrifice. He could he-had he commenced his career with only tell her of his ill success, and they less of suspicion, and met the world more | would spend one more evening together frankly than he did, he would have learned in sweet communion, and then he would that there was something worth living for, tear himself away forever, and seek his fortunes in some other part of the world. The sequel is short.
