A LION IN THE PATH.

Lives of great men all remind us We can make our lives sublime

From a record of sporting adventures in South Africa, recently published in an English Magazine, we make the following extract It is as thrillingly graphic as anything we have met with for some time :

Whilst breakfast was preparing, I proceed ed to take a saunter down to the pool, not without some faint hopes of a bath, though feared our horses, to say nothing of the other animals who had visited it during the night, might have mudded it too much for that.-However, I resolved to try, and throwing my Minie into the hollow of my arm, and cocking my wide-awake over my eyes, lounged dow a path among the bushes, now well beaten by the feet of men and horses. The latter I found up to their bellies in the pool, enjoying them-selves as completely as the flies would let them; but as the water looked uncommonly turbid, I thought I would skirt along a littl to the left and look for a cleaner spot; and so climbing a short steep, covered with long grass and underwood, I pushed aside some branches which intervened between me and a small clear space of shorter turf, and-to my very intense astonishment, though I must say not at that moment to my dismay, I was so used to the sight of them-found myself within a few yards of one of the finest male lions I ever saw, and who was engaged with a look of grave patriarchal interest in watching the movements of the horses below-doubtless se lecting one for his breakfast. Have you seen Landseer's etching of the lion in the old Tow er Menagerie ? In exactly the same attitude still and unmoving, like a noble statue, stood

Surely this was a case in which discretion would be the better part of valor; and, as he was so absorbed in contemplation of the horses below that he had not yet noticed me : I "concluded" (as Jonathan would say) to steal off as I came. Ah that dry twig that would place itself in the way of my very first retrogade footstep! The sharp crackle effected what the more subdued noise of previous movements had not done

Being so favorably located, they are already attracting the attention of capi-talists. The coal trade is now in its infancy. There is no other branch offering the same prospect for extending the field of action.-Population is increasing—business is increas subjected are increasing, and, in fact, the coal trade is doubling every few years. With its iron, its coal, its agricultural wealth, a new channel is found for the business of the State.

The genius of progress will create a revolution as astonishing and sudden as the nast.-Who could look back a few years and imagine the present would be the case? Where five or ten years ago it was an inaccessible desert, locomotive has summoned to life manufactures of the ship, from whom we obtained the and trade, and a wilderness has been turned into a gaiden. It is within the memory of many when the sites of great cities could have been bought for a few dollars. Immediately within our adjacent counties, the land which, five years ago, was selling at a few dollars an acre, is now selling at a hundred. We believe of those who dragged the sick was most lathat the improvement of Pennsylvania is just commencing—the tide of reinsylvania is being turned—people are opening their eyes, and they find they have wealth and plenty at home without going afar off. We have recently seen the report of James B. Montgomery, Esq., civil engineer, who gives the most flattering account of the survey of the Tyrone and Clearfield Railroad, con-necting the Central Railroad and the Sunbury and Erie, in Elk county. This will tend further to develope this location. Emigration and capital is already on the move. The Ridgway Farm and Coal Company has made an exten-sive purchase of a most valuable and fertile tract, whilst a number of gentlemen are about organizing a coal company on the line of the Sunbury and Erie Railroad, at St. Mary's, to go into operation immediately on its completion. The iron furnaces will also take an active start. It will be within seven hours' ride of Philadelphia, and the business of our metropois, we believe, will be increased one-fourth.—Philadelphia Ledger. No Room HERE .-- "No room here," cried a bey of musical voices—"not an inch of room!" my name and fame have been heralded thro the old and new world, and man pays homage to my genius." "It is well," replied the Goddess, "your claims will be duly considered.'

And he who next approached was a young man of quiet and genteel bearing, and it was thus he presented his claims for the glorious

"Lady, although not stricken in years, and but just entering on the active scenes of life, as short as has been my span, I've accom-plished something. I am the author of the well-known poem on 'Immortality,' and the ablest editors in the country have copied and eulogised my production."

And there stood in the presence of the Goddess one of military attire, bearing the honor-able scars of many a well-fought battle,-who spoke of "the dangers he had braved, and how he had preserved untarnished the glorious stars and stripes of Columbia's banner.' There came another applicant for the prize -a plain blunt man, attired in the garb of a sailor, whose rough visage denoted that he had contended with many a storm on the fathomless deep. "And what wonderful things have you formed ?" asked the Gallass. "Please your Ladyship, from boyhood I've been a ranger on the ocean; born, I might say, on the mighty deep, the sca has been my home; often have, I seen the lightning level our spars, and in many a violent gale I've tremendo heard the thunder in its roar; I have rescued many from a watery grave, and saved the infant as it clung to the neck of its dying mother." He who next appeared was of careworn brow; meagre were his looks, tattered were his tothes, and chill penury had almost worn him to the bones.

It was thus he spoke to the Goddess : "Lady, I am an author-a poor and ill-clad author; in my miserable garret I live a miserable existence, for I have no wherewith to satisfy the cravings of hunger. It is the fate of genius to contend with poverty, for as a brother clingeth to a brother, so the ills of life cling then. One half of my years have been devoted to Literature; long has been my struggle for 'a local habitation and a name,' but as yet I have found neither; and lady, if thou wouldst do an act of mercy, bestow on me thy crown of glory, and fame and fortune will be mine. And next there came one of gay attire and lofty bearing, who urged his claims as follows: "A merchant, Lady, extensively engaged in commerce, my warehouses are crowded with merchandise, and my ships float on every sea; my credit is unbounded, and my re-sponsibility has never been doubted; I have extended the hitherto restricted limits of trade, and overstocked the countries of the earth with the commodities of my own." And lastly there came forward one who stood abashed in the presence of the Guddess; he spoke very low, and with great timidity: "Lady, my claims are very trivial, and not worthy to relate. I am the friend of the poor, the unprotected, and the fatherless. I've placed bread on the empty tables of the famishing and ever have been the champion of the weak against the strong; over the faults and failings of erring humanity I have thrown the broad mantle of Charity; and as I would that others should do unto me, have I done unto them. I have clad and comforted the sorrow-stricken orphan, and caused the widow's heart to rejoice; I've plunged into the midst of pain and sickness, and bound up with the sweet cords of pity the aching brow; and have spread the healing balm of commiseration on the bleeding heart. Yet, Lady, I claim on merit for these things, in the doing of which I but discharged mv duty to my fel-low-creatures and my God, and had I not been summoned to your presence, I should not have appeared as a competitor for a prize to which I am not entitled." And he was about modestly withdrawing from her presence, when the Goddess arrested his progress : "Sir, to you alone belongs my crown of glory, for you have richly earned it. I bestow it upon the good man in preference to him who is great; great genius or great talents, it not allied to greatness of heart, availeth nothing. True fame consists in deeds of charity and brotherly love.
