A new and valuable agent, whereby surgical operations are painlessly performed, without the risk which has hitherto attended chloroform, has just been discovered by an English physician, who publishes an account of it in the London Medical Times. He states that by the use of this agent, in one case, perfect insensibility was produced in four minutes; in the second case in about six minutes; and in both instances where it was used the patients glided, so to speak, into complete anathesia without a struggle. This new agent is the bichloride of methylene, which differs from chloroform in the rapidity with which it produces perfect insensibility. In one case, in a warm room, the vaporization of the fluid was so rapid that frost was produced on the vessel containing it. vessel containing it.
