Davis farce is ended The President has pardoned him after Chief Justice Chase had decided that he could not be held for trial since the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment which provides that certuin classes of persons who have been engaged in the Rebellion, shall hereafter be incapable of holding office under the United States, unless their disability shall be removed by a twothird vote of Congress; this being the punishment declared by the people for their offence, they can not be subjected to any other. The proclamation, therefore, merely gives these preminent rebels a pardon for offences for which they could not, under the law, be further punished; in other words it gives them nothing; still, it is well that it was issued, as it puts an end forever to any question about the matter, and makes a public declaration to the world that the Rebellion is over, and that all its offences have been condoned. But it should have been issued long ago; everybody has long known that the trial of Davis would never take place, and that the proceedings in
