Saving Flower Seeds.

The American Agriculturalist says:

The American Agriculturalist says:

The American English and some other seeds are ripe, he will gather none. These plants and others have a way of bursting their capsules as soon as ripe, and throwing the seeds as far as possible. The only way to manage these is to take them as soon as the seed vessel is full formed and shows signs of maturity, and put them where they can scatter without loss.—We have used wire sieves to cover such seed pols, and found them to work admirably. It is necessary for one who would save seeds, whether for his own use or for sale, to study the habit of each plant, see what its natural mode of distributing its seed is and continued to the thing of the next permanded in the train, and were both in the same words.
