Fruits from the Battle Field. When Napoleon made demands upon Prussia to which she could not honoradown the gauntlet was prepared to cope with him whom he challenged. The military renown which the French had fairly won on so many bloody fields gave them a prestige as a fighting people. It was well known that Napoleon's armies would be made up of magnificent material, and no one doubted that the hosts which advanced against Prussia would be marshalled by generals fit to handle them. It was generally expected that the Prussians would be beaten in the contests, but German firmness was expected to carry them through the ar-

The masses clamorously demanded to be led to battle, but there was no government competent to direct the energies of the people. Bad management in the field went hand in hand with worse management at the seat of the Empire. What won der then that we have had an almost uninterrupted story[of Prussian successes. The fault is not with the armies, not with the commanders, not with the French people -the fault is with Napoleon and the system of government which was the work of his hands. He courted war and he has drawn down destruction upon his head. The best thing that could come to him now would be sudden death on the battle-field; and he might rank himself happy if the fatal messenger met him in an hour when the eagles of France were advancing it

The prayer of the Germans in this country for a United Germany seems likely to be fully and speedily answered. Nothing but the most unexpected reverses can prevent Prussia from becoming the controlling head of the German people. Under the rule of King William will sink into insignificance, and the whole Fatherland be merged in a con solidated monarchy, unless there should speedily arise a party strong enough when banded together to insist upon the complete recognition of the doctrine of State rights. The Prussian Military Machine. The Prussian Military Machine.
The present Prussian campaign is developing the wonderful power and perfection to which the military system of that monarchy has attained. The principle that every citizen owes his services to the country lies at the foundation of this great organization. By law every Prussian is a soldier. Prussia has been spoken of as an army holding a country rather than a country having an army. The regular army consists of men from twenty to twenty-five years of age, in which all must serve three years, except professional men, students. rears, except professional men, students te., whose term of service is one year Ac., whose term of service is one This term being served, the Prussian ters the Landwehr, or militia, which is divided into two levies. The second levy consists of men from thirty-three to thirty-nine years of age, and is liable to be called out in time of war for the purpose of garrisoning the fortresses. There is also an irregular force (Landturm) composed of men of over thirty-nine and

The great convenience of this arrangement to all but the citize of the traces of of this arrangement to all but the citize is obvious at a ghance. On the other hand, while the Prussians have toossessed this inians have possessed this important advantage, there are complaints by the French that their commissariat, owing the French that their commissariat, owing to the suddenness of the war, has been badly supplied. The immense Prussian military machine is susceptible of being put in motion as readily as if it included only the hundred men who used to compose the standing army of a small (forman principality. Not only is the machine as powerful as it can be made by human ingenuity, but it scens to be operated by ongineers of consummate ability. The war of Prussia with Austria disclosed the fact that there was a master spirit in the organization of armies and the conduct of war at the head of Prussian military affairs. It did not need that contest to demonstrate Prussian valor, but what stonished the world was a

There are a great many other buildings just being finished, such as Redick's Opera Honse, several magnificent churches, and quite a number of business houses.

Railroad matters are again looking up a little. The railroad bridge across the Missouri is being built as fast as possible; it is a pretty difficult piece of work, and it will take a few years to complete it. It will be one mile in length, from shore to shore. The Union Pacific is doing a large freight and passenger traffic. Another important fact, which gives an unparalleled facility of movement to Prussia's military operations, is that they are not encumbered with an unwieldy commissariat, but in towns where there are no barracks the troops are quartered upon the citizens.
