SECRETARY COX.

The Interference with his Reform Policy —The Circumstances of his Resignation.

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Advertiser, in forwarding the correspondence which led to the resignation of Secretary Cox, wrote as follows:

"Various statements of the causes which led to this step on the part of the Secretary, and also of the reasons which he assigned in the resignation, have been authorized at the White House. The letters themselves now set at rest all controversy in regard to their real contents and character. The following may be relied upon as a correct statement of some of the causes which forced the presentation of the issues set before the President by the Secretary.

"Throughout the summer General Cox had been aware of vigorous efforts, on the part of politicians and many whose schemes he would not forward in his department, to induce the President to remove him. Previous to leaving in September for a short vacation, there were unmistakable signs that the President was yielding to the concerted attack upon General Cox. Shortly after the latter left, the city an order, to which he had called the attention of the clerks in his department, regulating the absences for voting, was peremptorily revoked by the President, at the instance of Senators Chandler and Cameron, without any consultation whatever with the Secretary of any subsequent communication with him on the subject, further than the bare order of revocation. The order thus set aside was not a new one, and has been already referred to in these despatches, but its history should be briefly given here.

"A year ago the Secretary, in his efforts to render his department efficient, was greatly embarrassed by the long absence of the clerks. Most of them took the usual vacation of one month, and, subsequently, ten days, and more frequently two weeks in addition to go home and vote. The Secretary then gave notice that in future clerks must so arrange their vacations as to include the time of election, or reserve enough from he month allowed to enable them to vote, or, at their option, to take the full extra time given for election, and have it deducted from their pay.

"This year at the proper time it was formally brought to the attention of the clerks. The Pennsylvania politicians and others immediately carried the matter before the President, and he, with no other word to the Secretary, revoked his order. Meantime the boasts and threats of leading party managers, openly made in the department, showed that they were confident of a complete victory upon the question at issue between themselves and the Secretary, and their defiant conduct, both in private and in public, was such that no Cabinet officer having any self-respect could longer delay placing the issue of full support against them, or the acceptance of his resignation, squarely before the President.

"There had also been attempts from the same sources to change the Indian policy, so far, at least, as to dictate the appointment of agents, instead of allowing the selections to be made by benevolent and religious organizations. Finally, however, the President had directed correspondence to be opened with various missionary societies, asking them to recommend proper persons for agents. The Secretary, in carrying out the Presidents directions, had fully committed himself and the department to make such appointments as these societies should agree upon. As the recommendations arrived the commissions were accordingly made out and signed. Immediately after Senator Chandler appeared on the scene, one of these commissions was suspended and another revoked, and a man suggested by Chandler commissioned, the latter assigning, as a cover for the transaction, the false reason that the Methodists wanted this man for an agent. The society to which the Secretary had committed himself at once wrote to know why such had not been kept, and the Secretary again, through purely political intrigue, found himself in a very embarrassing position.

"Knowledge of the situation here reached him at Staten Island, where he was spending his vacation, and he finally consented to place the questions involved before the President in such a way as to ascertain whether it was the wish of the Executive to support him in the contest, or to abandon the field to the influences which had been at work so long and so persistently, and thus secure peace.

"Accordingly on the 3d of October the Secretary wrote the letter of resignation and mailed it to the President at Washington. The envelope was marked 'personal' to distinguish it from the mass of business mail, and to ensure its meeting the President's eye first. Upon the letter itself there were no marks to indicate that it was considered a private matter by the Secretary, nor has anything since passed between the President and the Secretary to indicate that either considered the letter other than the open official correspondence attending a resignation.

"The President's reply was written immediately upon the receipt of the resignation, namely, on October 5, and is thoroughout in his own hand. Instead of being forwarded to the Secretary himself at Staten Island, it was sent with the routine business mail to the Department, addressed in the usual business form, 'The Secretary of the Interior,' with no mark on the envelope to indicate that it was for the Secretary in person. Consequently it was opened with the business mail, and passed through several hands as ordinary business does, before it was stopped by the Secretary.

"Lest it might be supposed, from the statements which have been authorized, that the Secretary, in other communications, or verbally, has assigned personal reasons for resigning, the statement can be relied upon that the Secretary has never, either orally or in writing, laid any private and personal matters before the President as reasons why he should withdraw from the Cabinet."

The McGarrahan Claim.

The land involved is the Panoche Grande ranch, a tract of 9 square leagues in area, situated in Monterey and Fresno counties, California, about one hundred and twenty-five miles southeast of San Francisco, and now occupied by the New Idria Mining Company. All that gives value to it is its quicksilver mines, it being almost useless for agricultural purposes. With its improvements, it is worth perhaps a million.

The two parties contending for the ownership of the land are William McGarrahan of California and the New Idria Mining Company of the same State. This Company is mainly composed of Barron & Co., the great quicksilver merchants, who, with some other foreigners, own one-half the stock; W. C. Ralston, cashier of the Bank of California, who owns one-eighth; and D. O. Mills, President of the same bank, who also owns one-eighth. Mr. McGarrahan's claim is based upon an alleged grant made to one Vincente Gomez by the Mexican Government in 1843, which has been purchased by him. The New Idria Company claim by virtue of actual possession since 1862 by settlers to whose right they have succeeded, and under a law of the United States authorizing grants of mining companies to pre-empt lands which they have occupied and improved. Neither party has received any patent for the land from the United States as yet. Mr. McGarrahan is endeavoring to get such a patent, and the New Idria Company is resisting his efforts, and trying to get a patent for itself.

By the treaty between Mexico and the United States at Guadalupe Hidalgo, February 26, 1848, it was agreed that existing rights to land and other property should be respected, provided they should lawfully established before commissioners to be appointed to examine them and determine their validity. Under this treaty Gomez in 1853 put in his claim for the Panoche Grande ranch, with his proofs. Not being able to show actual occupation of the tract, the commissioners in 1855 rejected the claim. On appeal to the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, the decision of the commissioners was in 1858 reversed, and the claim confirmed. A further appeal was then taken by the United States District Attorney to the Supreme Court of the United States, which appeal was, in May, 1859, by consent of Attorney General Black, dismissed, and a mandate issued to the lower Court directing it to confirm the title of Gomez. The following year, however, Attorney-General Black, on grounds now alleged to be untrue, procured a reversal of the order dismissing the appeal and the recall of the mandate. This gave the United states the right to prosecute a second appeal within five years from the rendition of the original judgment. After the expiration of the five years the District Attorney of California obtained an appeal order, while the Judge granting it afterward annulled and refused to allow the appeal. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court took up this second appeal, and in 1869, after various motions, the decree of the California District Court was reversed, and a judgment rendered adverse to Gomez.

Pending these legal proceedings, Mr McGarrahan had purchased the claim of Gomez, and when the decision of the Supreme Court prevented him from obtaining a patent for the land, he presented a petition to Congress asking for the passage of a special act confirming Gomez's title. In 1868 the Committee of the House of Representatives reported in his favor, but the next year the Senate Committee were equally divided.—In April last he had another hearing before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives; but as yet Congress has taken no action in the matter. He asserts that a stipulation was entered into between his counsel and the counsel on the other side, that, until such action was had, neither party should make any demand upon the Executive Department of the Government for a patent nor receive one, and that in violation of this stipulation the New Idria Company endeavored to persuade and did persuade Secretary Cox to issue a patent to them. President Grant, however, issued an order suspending all action in the case until Congress should have disposed of it, and there the matter now rests.

In opposition to the claim of McGarrahan, the New Idria Company alleges various frauds on his part and that of Gomez. They charge Gomez with having forged evidence, with having procured the first decision of the District Court in his favor by collution, and with tampering with records and officials. On the other hand, McGarrahan says that the New Idria people have bought up United States attorneys and counsel, forged some papers and destroyed others, and resorted to bribery and cheating in every possible form. These curious in such matters can find a detailed statement of these charges and counter-charges set forth in the dozen or more pamphlets which have been issued by one or the other of the two parties.

A Menagerie in a Tornado—A Strange Story.

The Columbus Journal gives details of the destruction of Van Amburg's Menagerie tent by a tornado at Belleville, Ohio, during the exhibition on October 21st. It is likely that the story is somewhat exaggerated.

It appears that on that day Van Amburg's Menagerie happened to be in that village, and in the evening an audience of some thousands of people, gathered from many miles around, had assembled to see the animals and to witness the performances advertised in connection therewith, consisting of feats of trained animals, there being no circus attached to the exhibition.

Now to understand what follows it should be understood that Van Amburg's tent is not like a circus tent, a circular wigwam affair with a single centre pole, but an immense oblong pavilion, equal in length to six circus tents joined side by side and supported by six centre poles like the six masts of the great Eastern steamship, and innumerable smaller poles, all of which are securely fastened by guy ropes extended to stakes driven deeply in the ground.—Within this pavilion, extending upon the right from the entrance, the extreme length of the tent, were the cages of the wild beasts. At the far end, facing the entrance, stood the cage of the great eland and the rhinoceros, a couple of camels, tethered, and the elephants, Tippoo Saib and Hannibal, Jr. Upon the opposite side were the seats for the audience, rising in tiers from the ground to the height of the tent, as is common in all travelling exhibitions. At the moment when the whirlwind struck the tent the spectators were all seated, and in the vacant space in the centre of the ground the performers attached to the menagerie had just commenced the exhibition of feats by some of the dogs and ponies belonging to the establishment. There was no wind stirring, nor the slightest indication of any unusual agitation of the elements.

Outside the tent, an eye-witness informs us, five minutes before the disaster the stars were shining brightly, and scarcely a breath of air was moving. Suddenly, miles away in the distance, was seen a large black cloud, reaching apparently from the heavens to the earth, advancing with lightning-like rapidity, driving tremendous whirls of dust before it, directly towards the tent in which these unsuspicious people were so pleasantly enjoying themselves.—The experienced managers saw the danger, and instantly a crowd of the men were sent inside to prop up the tent, so as to offer less surface to the approaching storm. But, incredible as it may appear, before the audience had scarcely noticed the unusual movements of these men, the tornado had taken the tent, with all its six ponderous masts, clear and clean over their heads, rising like a balloon, and falling directly afterward in the adjacent fields, a mixed and tangled mass of cordage, lumber and canvas, leaving the spectators sitting bewildered in the open air. At the same moment many of the cages were overturned—among them the dens of lions and leopards in the centre, which, in their fall crushed Langworthy, the "Lion King," under them, so that he was picked up for dead. The large elephant broke loose, and started for the open fields. All this before the people on the seats really comprehended what had happened. The next instant it seemed as if the fountains of the deep had overflowed so heavily came the rain.

The reader can easily imagine the scene of terror which ensued. The beasts howling, women and children shrieking, the rain pouring in torrents, the night pitchy black, a mass of terrified humanity, surrounded by howling animals, frantic with excitement, and every one a prey to the direct apprehension of still more tangible horrors. But so judicious were the measures taken by the managers, that of all these terrified bewildered people, not one was seriously injured except a couple of children, who, being seated high, had been struck by some of the ropes or blocks as the tent fell down over their heads. Torches were soon produced, order restored, and in an hour the men were busily employed in repairing the damage to the tent, so that on the following day the company exhibited, as advertised, in the town of Mt. Vernon, twenty miles distant. Langworthy's injuries were not so serious as at first supposed, and he was enabled to resume his performances, at Newark, on Monday last.

EUGENIE.

Her New Home in England—Historic Associations.

A fairer home in this her time of trial, says an English correspondent, than that which she has found at Camden place, Chiselhurst—one, too, more hallowed by interesting traditional historical associations—the Empress could not well have.

A house that is the picture of Georgian substantiality and comfort; warm and snug-looking, with walls of yellow brick, standing upon a kind of platform of verdant turf, whence there is a view right away, past the leafy woodlands of Kent, past Sydenham, with its glass palace, past rustic homesteads and smoky towns, away to the bosky uplands of Surrey—a house up to which there leads a stately avenue of trees, which have outlived the gallants and belles, the courtiers and the wits, the statesmen and the authors of a past age, who have talked, flirted, intrigued, speculated beneath their shade; entered through huge gates fantastically decorated with white and gold; a garden whose beds gleam in this bright October sun with the gayest of autumnal flowers, populous with statues which meet you at every bend in the groves and every turn in your walk; a park in front, on one side elevated above the surrounding country, and looking down upon a magnificent series of woods, where foliage glistens with the thousand hues of autumn—green, russet, golden: on the other immediately contiguous to Chiselhurst common: this is Camden place. A fair place, and a pleasant, in truth; one which it does infinite credit to the judgment of old Wm. Camden to have selected as his Tusculum, whither he occasionally resorted for rest and relaxation when overcome with the labors of State, and to which, i. e. to the house which then stood here, when he felt that he had done enough for one lifetime, he betook himself in 1800 to spend the remainder of his days.

There were seats to be seen—built as to the lands into which Camden place passed upon the death, in 1823, of its illustrious owner. Eventually it was sold to Charles Pratt, Esq., who, having "sat some time in the Court of Common Pleas as Lord Justice with much popular applause" to quote the words of his biography, was first knighted, was subsequently advanced to the title of Lord Camden, of Camden place, and next year was made Lord High Chancellor." He died as Lord Camden and Viscount Bayham in 1794. His son, Lord Jeffries Earl Camden, was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland until the commencement of the century still lived at Camden place. But the interest with which the house and its surroundings are invested mainly descends to us from the days when the great William Camden was its lord.—Then Camden place was a rendezvous far much of the most brilliant society of the day. Ben Jonson was a regular guest, and would there meet down from town a band of chosen friends to enliven he great antiquarian, who founded the History Lectura at Oxford, with their wit and all the latest anecdotes of the town. It is possible that the scenes of the "Alchemist" may have been re-enacted in the glades and galleries of Camden place. A pleasant flavor of antiquity clings, indeed, to the whole place, and of its distinguished and famous owner. Camden was a name expressive of its situation among the trees. Sir Nicholas Walsingham, the Elizabethan statesman, lived at Scadbury, close to Camden place, and it may not perhaps be generally known that the whole manor of Chiselhurst was once the marriage portion of the "Fair Maid of Kent," daughter of Edward III., and later passed into the hands of the great Nevill, Earl of Warwick, "the King Maker," the last of those mighty barons who overawed the throne and the Commons.

WHOLESALE BURGLARY.

How a Pair of Rogues Went Through a "Reformed Synod."

On Sunday night last the most general burglary which ever occurred in Mechanicsburg was committed. The parties perpetrating the robberies are supposed to be two Germans who, under very suspicious circumstances, were seen in town on Saturday and Sunday.

Starting at the western end of Main street they proceeded to Mr. Frederick Seidle's, where they obtained a coat and one pair of shoes; thence to the residence of Mr. James Cathcart, where they purloined one dress coat, one overcoat, and one dozen solid silver spoons; thence to Mrs. C. Comfort's, where they got a large amount of underwear, to the value of several hundred dollars, and two great coats belonging to delegates of the Reformed Synod then sitting here, both being ministers; thence to Captain J. Dorschemer's, where they succeeded in getting one-half dozen silver spoons; thence to Mr. David Deveney's, where they stole two black overcoats belonging to ministers of the synod; also the proceeds of the collection at the United Brethren Church; thence they proceeded to Mr. Hickernell's where they secured one half dozen silver spoons and a butter-knife; thence to John Eberly's, where they secured an overcoat.

Taken all in all, it was decidedly one of the coolest pieces of thievery that we have heard of for a long time. No doubt there are other places at which they made successful efforts, but we have not heard of them. We understand that a reward has been offered for the detection of the thieves and recovery of the stolen property, but we doubt if individuals smart enough to "go through" Mechanicsburg, as they did on Sunday night, are sufficiently dumb to be caught. We had hoped that the large number of respectable and divine visitors in our town during the week would conduce to its peace, quiet, and security, but the Devil is no respecter of persons, and his agents usually select the most favorable time for doing their work.—Mechanicsburg Journal.

A Hundred Thousand Strike.

Mr. A. Heilman, of the firm of J. & W. Seligman, brokers in New York, is a happy man. He is extremely happy because he received to-day a dispatch from San Francisco, informing him that his ticket, No. 154,077, had drawn the $100,000 prize (in gold), in the Mercantile Library lottery in that city. The ticket which drew this prize was originally purchased for ten dollars by a man, who becoming dissatisfied with the ticket, sold it to Mr. Heilman and bought another. Thus did he unwittingly dispose of a splendid fortune. As soon as the news of Mr. Heilman's good fortune was made known in Wall street, crowds of his friends flocked to his office and congratulated him on his big luck.

Lee

The Lee Memorial Association have issued an address to the surviving Confederate soldiers, inviting them to become members of the Association upon the payment of a dollar each. Contributions are solicited from others, who will be inscribed as honorary members. They say:

After General Lee assumed the Presidency of Washington College, his earliest work was the erection of a Chapel on the College grounds. Beneath that chaste and massive structure, in the room designed for a library, and adjoining the office filled with mementoes of his last unselfish, earnest labors, his ashes now repose. And there, in the temple reared by himself, at the home of his adoption, will be his fitting, and we believe, his enduring resting-place. We hold this conviction because his remains now rest in the spot chosen by those who alone had a right to decide—because this spot would most likely have been approved by the illustrious dead himself, had his self-forgetting mind ever dwelt for a moment on such a question—because it holds his memory aloof from the possible contaminations of party politics—because it accords with the custom observed by the great Fathers and servants of the State, all of whom preferred unostentatious resting places—and because his tomb here will be really more useful in connection with the last work of his exemplary life in perpetuating the good influences of the College of Washington and Lee throughout the South. We therefore invite his brethren and followers in the momentous struggle, which has made his name and their own immortal, to unite in constructing here a Mausoleum, worthy the foremost man of all his time."

John C. Breckinridge is President of the Association, Gen. Joseph E. Johnston Vice President at large, and the funds are deposited in the Bank of Lexington, Va.

The President has appointed Vernon S. Vaughan, of Alabama, Governor of Utah, and George S. Black, Secretary for that Territory.

MEDICAL.

1840 PROF. HOLLOWAY'S 1870

The celebrated medicine has won a deservedly high reputation as an alleviator of pain and preserver of health. It has become a household remedy, from the fact that it saves immediate suffering, and, by its timely and agreeable preparation, ought from the best and purest materials, safe to keep, and use in every family, as recommended by physicians and persons of all classes, and to-day, after a public trial of thirty years. The average life of mankind is considerably increased, and the spreading its mediuines over the whole world. Its large and increasing sale affords positive evidence of its enduring fame. We do not deem it necessary to say more in its favor as one small bottle will do more to convince you of its excellence than a column of advertisements in the world. Give it one earnest trial and you would not be without it for ten times its cost.

Directions for accompanying each bottle.

Sold by all Druggists.

Price 25 cents, 62 cents, and $1 per bottle.
