THE LANCASTER WEEKLY INTELLIGENCER, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1870.

Miscellaneous.

For the Intelligencer.

MEMORY.

BY LIZZIE M'CRACKEN.

"Tis sweet to remember! I would not forego,
The charm which the past o'er the present can throw;
For all the gay visions that fancy may weave,
In her web of illusion, that shines to deceive,
We know not the future—the past we have felt—
It's cherished enjoyments the bosom can melt;
It's raptures anew o'er our pulses may roll,
When thoughts of to-morrow fall cold on the soul.

'Tis sweet to remember! when friends are unkind,
When their coldness and carelessness shadow the mind;
Then to draw back the veil which envelopes a land,
Where delectable prospects in beauty expand;
To smell the green fields—the fresh waters to hear,
Whose once fairy music enchanted the ear;
To think in the spirits that delighted us then,
To list the fond voices of friendship again!
Oh, this, the sad heart, like a reed that is bruised,
Binds up, when the banquet of hope is fused.

'Tis sweet to remember! and sweeter can be
The balm-breathing comfort, the glory, the joy,
Which spring from that fountain to gladden our way,
When the clouds of sad and luthless desert or betray,
I would not forget! though my thoughts should be dark,
O'er the cherished life-flood back from me bark,
And I see the lost Eden where once I was blest,
A type and a promise of heavenly rest.

HOW TO WOO AND WIN.

BY JOHN G. SAXE.

"Would you play the manly lover?
Sold a greybeard to his son.
"List, my lad, while I discover
How a maiden should be won.

"Woo her not with boastful pleas—
Lest you teach her lips to snare;
Still a suitor's warmest praises
In his comliest should appear.

"Woo her not with senseless sighing—
Maidens love a laughing eye;
Tell her not that you are dying—
Lest she, mocking, bid you die!

"Woo her not with weakly whining—
O'er your poverty or pelf,
Lest she answer by declining
Both your sorrow—and yourself!

"Woo her with a manly bearing,
Giving hostages to fate;
All the fearless fervor showing
By its strength to be worth mated.

"Woo her not with silly prattle
Whom you wish would woo your wife;
But with proofs that no mere babbler
You are equal to the strife.

"Like the knight whose simple name
Won the lady—woo the dame,
Who despite their world-wide wooing
All the rest were doomed to lack!

"Lady?" quoth the bold Knight Errant
"Pity the story I shall tell;
I would wed her—love her—worship
I shall love and serve her well!"

"And indeed! his deeds of fairest
Crutch a horse-shoe like a twig!
And within her lighted lattice
All the gold the maiden made!"

A Slight Family Disturbance.

BY N. P. DARLING.

"Good bye, dear," said Mr. Job Gunther, as he lobbed the dear one to his breast.

The dear one above mentioned was Miss McKenzie, and she lived in the town of Bazoo, and she was an only child, and lived with her father and mother, whom she loved very much, but not quite as much as she did Job.

And so when Job said good-bye, she said good-bye, and when he lobbed her to his breast she folded him to her breast, and then they kissed, and oh, what a long, long kiss it was. It didn't seem as though they would ever get their lips apart; but they did, and then they unfolded themselves, and Job snatched up his carpet bag, and then he snatched up his overcoat, and including out his watch, he said:

"I have only five minutes to catch the depot," and he snatched another kiss and ran.

"Adieu, Job," cried Ann. "Write often."

"I will, darling," an echo Job, as just then darted around the corner, and Sarah turned and closed the door, and went back into the breakfast room, where Mr. McKenzie was entertaining and had boiled eggs, drinking strong coffee and reading the morning papers.

"How long is Job going to be gone?" inquired Mr. McKenzie, looking up from his paper a Saturday.

"Two months," sent a pang, and immediately a freshet of tears inundated her countenance, and came very near flooding her nose off from her face.

"Well, well, don't cry, my dear," said Mr. McKenzie, putting her comfy on the back. "Two month will soon pass away, and then—"

"And then," interrupted Mrs. McKenzie, who had just come into the room, "there'll be a wedding."

"And Miss Sarah McKenzie will be no more," cried the old gentleman, still petting his daughter on her back. It was a habit he had got into, owing to a habit his wife had of swallowing things the wrong way and choking herself. He had been obliged to pat her on the back so much, that now he didn't feel really at ease unless he had a back to pat.

There's something very consoling in the mention of a wedding, I fancy, particularly to the person who is going to take one of the principal parts in the said wedding. It had been an effect upon Sarah, certainly, for she stopped wicked at once, and soon began to dry her eyes with her cambric pocket handkerchief.

"There, there, Sarah, now w'ill finish our breakfast, won't we?"

And Sarah said she would, and sat down to the table; and while she is sipping her coffee and devouring muffins, if you've no objections, my jolly reader, we'll talk over matters and things, and perhaps I will tell you something about Job.

I intended to let you take a peep at Sarah while she was eating her breakfast, because she's such a pretty woman that she is really worth looking at, usually; but unfortunately tears always spoils her good looks for the time being. You notice now how red and swollen her nose looks, and it looks so like a glass bottle, and the cherry—well, I'll tell you about Job.

Job Gunther hadn't any father. I suppose he had one, but as the time I speak of he was entirely destitute of the article. He had a brother, and his name was Joseph, but he wasn't the one you are thinking of. Job's brother don't want a coat of many colors. Joe was satisfied with a coat of no color, and he didn't care a snap what color it was if it was only fast.

Job and Joe were both born in Ripplestone, and there they grew to manhood, and Joe he went into the dry goods business, and then he got married, and the married his business, and then, as the years rolled on he began to think that Ripplestone was too small for a man of his abilities, and he began to think seriously of coming to Bazoo city. He did not come with a cry, if it was only one cravat.

Meantime Job wasn't quite as successful as his brother. Forten years he had been in the employ of the Bazoo Manufacturing Company and though his salary had been small at first, it was sufficiently large, he thought to warrant him in taking a very important step in life. This warrantable step was a step into matrimony.

Mr. Job Gunther had loved Miss Sarah McKenzie for nine years seven months and fourteen days, when suddenly the idea dawned upon him that his salary was sufficient to support a small family.

Job was a man who never allowed an idea to strike him twice. He went directly to Sarah's house, and she invited him into the parlor.

"Sarah," said Job, "I have been I yer for a long time."

"How long?" she inquired.

"For nine years, seven months and fourteen days," Job replied promptly.

"And I have loved you a long time, and Sarah.

Job didn't ask her how long, though he wanted to. He only said:

"Well, do you love me now?"

"Yes, Job, I do."

"And you will be Mrs. Gunther?"

"I will."

"Good," cried Job. "And now let us settle the rest of the business. Two weeks to-day I start for the West. I shall be gone two months upon business for the company. When I return, we will be married. Name the day yourself, and be sure and take time enough to get everything ready."

"Oh, I could get ready in twenty-four hours to marry you, Job," cried Sarah, throwing her lily white arms around his neck, and giving him a kiss that made him blush clear back behind his ears.

You understand from this, that Job hadn't been kissed a great deal. No, Job wasn't or hadn't been a kissing man, and Sarah's attack rather confused him. But he rallied very soon, and said:

"My dear, having loved you as I remarked, for nine years, seven months and fourteen days, it isn't my intention now to get married in a hurry. I shall have everything ready beforehand."

"O yes," said Sarah. "I'm in no hurry. O no! I only meant to be understood that although it would take a long time to marry anybody else, I could get ready to marry you in twenty four hours, if it were necessary."

"That's all right," said Job, "and now if you've a mind to, you can do that again,"

"Do what?" asked Sarah, opening her beautiful eyes.

"Why, you know," replied Job, puckering his lips.

"O! a kiss?"

"M'm."

"There! Was it sweet?"

"As sugar. And now about your father. Will he have any objections to this little arrangement of ours?"

"O, no."

"Well, then, it's settled, I suppose."

"Yes."

And so these two lovers seated themselves on the sofa, and she laid her head on his breast, and he laid his head on her head, and he put one arm around her frame-work, and clasped her hand in his, and for two hours and seventeen minutes neither of them moved a peg, and as their conversation was carried on in the softest kind of whispers, of course I can't tell you what was said, and luckily for my story, it makes little difference.

Mr. Job Gunther was a very methodical young man. Finding himself the accepted lover of one of the sweetest girls that ever wore a switch, and realizing that he had only two weeks to be with her prior to an absence of two months, he felt it to be his duty, not only to himself, but to his beloved one, to spend as much of his precious time as he could in her company, and so he passed two hours and seventeen minutes every evening in her society, and before the expiration of the two weeks he had made such proficiency in the art of love, that he could kiss almost as well as you can, my lovely reader.

We left Sarah at breakfast, and as I have nothing for her to do for the space of two months, except read Job's letters and write answers, you may suppose that she sat at that table for eight weeks, if you want to. I don't say that she did. It is barely possible that she did not, but as I don't know, I decline to say anything about it, because I consider that I am responsible for every statement that I make.

All I know is, that she was sitting at the same table on a certain fine morning, just about two months from the time when we saw her there before, and she was eating buckwheat cakes and maple syrup, and she was all alone when suddenly the door-bell rang.

As door-bells generally do ring suddenly, she wasn't surprised in the least, but her heart beat violently when she thought that it might be Job. She knew that he was on the way home, and he might drop in at any moment.

She rose quickly from her chair, if she had been sitting there two months, I guess her joints felt rather stiff) and hurried to the door.

Why, good morning, Miss Crixy.—Walk right in."

And so Miss Crixy did walk right in, and Sarah handed her a chair, and asked her to be seated.

You never knew the Crixys? No, I thought not. There were fourteen in the family—all old maids, the youngest, Althea, being thirty-five.

This was Althea; a tall dark complexioned woman, with small thin nose, and a pair of thin puckered lips; and she was never known to carry good news into the house, and therefore she never went into a house unless she had bad news.

"I was down to Boston yesterday," said she, her small black eyes twinkling with delight.

"Ah, indeed!"

"Yes, I went down to do some shopping. The woman do you think I saw there?"

"Why, I'm not sure, I can't guess. Was it any one that I know?" asked Sarah.

"I believe so," returned Miss Crixy. "A gentleman or a lady?"

"A gentleman or at least, I suppose he calls himself one, though I have my opinion about that."

"It wasn't Mr. Fiddle?"

"O no. It was a man that left town two months ago. He said he was going West on business, and I understood that he was going to marry a certain young lady of this town, when he returned."

"You don't mean Job?" cried Sarah, turning to him wide-t extent her beautiful black eyes.

"I don't mean anybody else," said Miss Crixy.

"Then he'll be home to-day."

"I don't know about that. He didn't speak to me. He didn't recognize me in Boston, though I believe he does know my name, when he is in Bazoo. Perhaps he thought I didn't know him."

"Why, how you talk, Miss Crixy. Job is not a bit proud, and I am sure if he had seen you—"

"I—no! Why, I spoke to him and he looked me right in the face, and then he blushed and turned away without saying a word. But the creature that was with him looked at me sharp enough, and I heard her ask him who I was."

"You don't mean to say there was a woman with him?" cried Sarah, turning very red and then very pale.

"Well, I did, and she was n't a bit too respectable either, I calculate," said Miss Crixy.

"Miss Crixy, you must have been mistaken. It could not have been Job, I am sure. And with a woman too!—O, Job wouldn't do any such thing."

"O well, if you don't want to believe me, you needn't. I am sure it's nothing to me what Job Gunther does, and if he chooses to go Boston and American Museum, to the street St., three doors above Twelfth, Philadelphia, embracing the subjects: How to Live and What to Live for; Youth, Maturity and Old Age; Manhood Generally Reviewed; The cause of Indigestion; Flatulence and nervous Diseases accounted for; Marriage Philosophically considered. FOR SALE OR RENT.

A VALUABLE FARM IN LITTLE BRITAIN TOWNSHIP AT PRIVATE SALE.

The undersigned offers his valuable Farm, situated in the township aforesaid at private sale,

CONTAINING 108 ACRES,

more or less, adjoining lands of Nathan Haines, David Christy, John G. Isom and others, upon which is erected a two-story Dwelling House, a fine Bank Barn, 66 by 103 feet, (but recently erected) roofed with slate, with Granaries and Corn Crib, all complete. Two Apple orchards and other fruit on the premises, and all the necessary out-buildings. Two good springs of water, from which every field can be watered. 84 acres of the above tract is arable, and the balance is covered with heavy timber, principally white oak. The land is in a high state of cultivation, under good fence, convenient to churches, mills, stores, schools, &c. It is unsurpassed for productiveness, being as good quality of land as the above township can produce, divided into convenient fields, good meadow and running water in most of the fields. There are about 1,200 yards of stone Orange Hedge, strong, well-set and neatly trimmed.

The buildings are finely located near the centre of the farm, within an easy walk to school and church, all in good order, painted throughout with Maple trees on each side, of 25 years growth, leading to the public road. A large and beautiful grove, containing over forty trees of ornamental trees. There is also a young Apple orchard, with a good variety of choice fruit.

This property lies three miles south of the Peach Bottom Railroad Depot, and is known as the "Limestone Road," leading from Quarryville to Oxford borough. As a view will be no less necessary to purchasers, persons desirous of doing so will please call upon David Christy, residing on the property, by whom the same will be shown or upon the subscriber at Mechanicsville.

Possession will be given the present tenant on the 1st of April, 1871, when possession will be given of the dwelling house, and the same bearing interest from date of possession sold.

Persons wishing to examine the premises previous to day of sale,
