ing cries reached Lowder's ears, and he care, and he went into fashionable society, while my poor mother and I lived obscurely. He was a profligate and a rone, but he had an air of fashion that awakened my boyish admiration, and aroused my mother's affectionate pride in him. She was always pleading to be introduced to his relatives, and to have her son publicly active, and to have her son publicly active ensured by the contract of the contrac
