The Bloody Shirt Again. Within a year past every one of the so-called Southern Governors has declared that peace and quiet reigned throughout his dominions. The people f the North have heard these annou ments with profound pleasure. The more timid and credulous among the Radicals have been greatly relieved by the assurance that those terrible and ghostly riders, the mysterious and un members of the mythical Ku Klux-Klan, no longer raided it through the swamps and forests of the South at that dread hour of night when churchyards yawn. Republican newspapers congratulated their readers upon the pleasing change, and portrayed i glowing colors the glories of a recon struction policy which had produced such splendid results. We were inform ed that the military would no longer b needed in the South, and there was seri ous talk about a very decided reduction in the army. Every thing was lovely, and everybody was about ready to en brace and to forget the past. Talk of a general amnesty, by which all vestiges of disfranchisement were to be wip out, was universal and had grown to be popular with the masses of the Repub lican party. The era of good feeling be tween the two sections of our common country seemed about to dawn, and the shadows of a long and dreary night of war and dissolution were being rapidly swept from the horizon over which the had hung like a pall. During this peaceful state of affair elections took place in a number or Southern States. They were quiet and Southern States. They were quiet and southern States. They were quiet and orderly, except when collisions were provoked by the unwarranted acts of faderal soldlery, or by the brutal con-duct of gangs of cut-throat militin, such as those which Holden mustered in newly-elected President will appoint North Carolina. In fact, the quietude and good order which prevailed, at these uet so that the carpet-bagers and callawags who were defeated had not the nudacity, at first, to raise their cus-tomary cries of fraud and violence. were permitted to cast a free ballot, that the bloody shirt was again raised. After Congress assembled, those mos interested in the re-election of Gran reviewed the situation and became con vinced that all would be lost unless some excuse could be devised for sub tecting the South to military rule again With the evidences of renewed strength in the Northern States, which had been exhibited by the Democratic party, it easy triumph in 1872, with a free throughout the country, was admitted to be certain. How to meet and avert cen so completely disgusted by negrothis danger was the problem to be solved by the Radical leaders. After casting bout them in all directions, they concluded that a resort to military force was their only hope. So rumors of violence in the South were industriously circulated, and at length it was authoritatively anounced that the President was an to send a message to Congress in which would be transmitted accounts of the most terrible disorders which were said to prevail throughout the Southern states. This plan seemed to be open to serious oblections, and the more discreet friends of the President advised a modification--so a depial that Grant ever contemplated the transmission of such a message was filtered through the Associated Press hannels, and instead of a message a mass of old reports, including all the old calumnies upon the Southern people, which had accumulated in a period the Unnecessary Costliness of the Navy, The Washington correspondent of the New York Tribunc says :

New York Tribing says: The Naval Appropriation bill, appropri-ates $19,313,111 25 for the support of the Navy for the fixeal year ending June 30, 1872. This is an increase of $509,604 48 over the appropriations for the current year. The item of pay alone amounts to $1,500,000, which is more than half the pay of the army, although the number of officers and men-belonging to the maxy is loss than one half the number which make up the Millary establishment. This is accounted for by establishment. This is accounted for by the great disproportion which exists be-tween the number of officers and of seamen n the navy, and the proponderance of high anks.
