One exquisite bit is a small dull gold basket with a high slender handle, filled with the loveliest of tiny sweetheart rosebuds, which peep up from the soft turf through feathery sprays of maidenhair. The handle is tied with a bow of sea-blue satin ribbon. The basket is indeed one of the daintiest debutante offerings of the season.

HURRAH! HURRAH!

"Teddy" Explains "His Policies" Via Lew Dockstader at Keith's.

The ubiquitous "Teddy," the loquacious "Teddy," the "Teddy" Don Quixote charging the windmills of predatory wealth, the famous founder of the "Ananias club" and the wielder of the "big club," appeared yesterday at Keith's Chestnut Street Theatre vicariously in the person of Lew Dockstader, that joyous minstrel

Clothed in khaki uniform, wearing the familiar spectacles and the grinning teeth, the celebrated black-faced Lew gave a burlesque of a certain "third-term candidate" which is one of the most uproarfously side-splitting funny acts that has appeared in vaudeville. Charging back and forth, imitating the famous hissing voice to perfection, Dockstader proceeded to explain the famous "policies."

"The Constitution of the United States gives men the privilege of thinking for themselves," declared he, with a sweep of the arm. "But if any man disagrees with me he disabuses that privilege.

"It is true, as many people say, that I resemble George Washington in many ways. George Washington served his country-so did I. George Washington led the battles of his country-so did I. George Washington never told a lie-ah, there's where I got it on George.

"During my absence in South America many things happened. During my absence in South America the hirth rate decreased below the birth rate of any country on the globe. Now, I don't mean to say I blame the Democrats. But the people should have been more 'pro-

"When I got back after my eight months' absence what did I find that Wilson and Bryan had done to MY country When I left MY country MY people were happy. When I came back MY people were unhappy. "When I was in South America the doctor gave me a hypodermic injection, and I began to discover things. I discovered a river-a river 1000 miles long. I'd have discovered more. only the doctor lost his hypo. Among other things I discovered new and strange birds. I discovered what I called the prohibition bird. The prohibition bird is a busybody, with a large mouth. At night it seeks the wet places.

'Now I don't have anything against Bryan. Bryan is called Colonel, and so am L. But when people salute me they salute an officer of the army. Bryan never saw a battle. When people salute Bryan as Colonel they mean the interior of a nut." Of the nine acts on the Keith bill this week not one can be adversely criticised as lacking in genuine amusing qualities and high order of presentation-the bill is of superlative excelence and a top-notch combination in vaudeville where, too often, the salad is spoiled by bugs in the leaves. Irvin Cobb's appealing story, "Sergeant Bagby," has been made into an act of delicious, remantic humor. It is reunion day in the South. The Southern soldier and the Yankee meet and are about to fight, but, under the influence of the genial, beloved Bagby, shake hands for a reunited country. There is an elopement, a marriage under unique circumstances and Bagby telling the story of the impending battle, when the General asks: "Where is Sergeant Bagby?" "Here, your honor," replies Bagby, bowing. "Then," says the General, "let the battle proceed."

Ma-Belle-aery, faery-with a ballet of equally aery, faery girls, floats, soars and glides through a series of captivating dances. Ma-Belle lifts you into the air, takes you with her into the magical maxes of the danse coquette and solo classique. Ma-Belle and her dances are altogether lovely.

In contrast to the rest of the bill, Chris Richards, an English comedian, performs grotesque antics different from but as funny as the act of Dockstader, and Lamberti, in quick changes, gives marvelous impersonations of Liszt, Hollman, Johann Strauss, Paderewski and Gounod. In "The Rube," presented by Mr. and Mrs. Jimmy Barry, Barry appears as Zeke Wilkins, from Hensfoot Corners, in New York selling eggs. In the role of a "Johnny" courting Dazie Dazzleman, the actress, he effects bucolic facial expressions provocative of such high humor that one might with justification call him "the Mark Twain of vaudeville."

Winthrop Amea has engaged Herbert Kelcey and Effic Shannon to act the principal roles in "The Children of Earth," the prize play by Alice Brown, which he is to produce next month.

Meanwhile, at the Little Theatre, in New York, October 20, Mr. Ames will present "A Pair of Silk Stockings," a comedy by Cyril Harcourt, which was one of London's last seasen's successes,

THE DRAMA

JULIETTE DAY In "Chin-Chin" at the Forrest.

A LADY IN DEBT, A MARRIAGE IN JAIL

Mrs. Fiske in a Deliciously Amusing Comedy, "Lady Betty Martingale." An Orchid Among Plays.

A gay and dashing lady, a dare-devillah, gambling, swearing lady, a lady of wit, engagingly unscrupulous, borrowing money right and left, and running up exorbitant bills at the dressmakers, jewelers and perfumers. Such is Lady Betty, the heroine of the new comedy by John Luther Long, the celebrated authorof "Madam Butterfly," and Frank Stayton, an Englishman, which opened last night at the Broad Street Theatre. By the incomparable art of Mrs. Fiske, Lady Betty vivaciously and volubly stepped into life from the time of George II, and for nigh three hours delightfully held a curious, surprised and questioning audience by her whimsical escapades.

In a day of plays dealing with politicians, criminals, lady smugglers, millionaires with pasts, derelict husbands and musical comedies of surface humor, Lady Betty Martingale appears as an orchid in the theatrical conservatory of ferns and geraniums. Quaint in its hoop-skirt charm, bizarre in its reminiscence of Sheridan and the atmosphere of 1750, the popularity of the play at this time is still dubious. For while the play must have an irresistible appeal to those who enjoy the unusual, the subtle, the exotic, it will be interesting to observe what wider appeal it may have for those who throng houses featuring gorgeous girls in glittering gowns or abbreviated apparel.

Lady Betty, summoned by her father, Canor. Slowpeck, who has expended 20,000 pounds of money borrowed from Sir Ricochet Rascible, Lord High Chancellor of England, on the writing of a dictionary, is confronted in the first act by the aforesald Sir Ricochet, who sinks upon his knees and begs her to marry him The corpulent Sir Ricochet, as Lady Betty says, has truly a strawberry nose." Arthur Elliot, as the blustering, bullying High Chancellor, is roaringly funny-only he roars too loudly at first and thus destroys the effect of his rage after Lady Betty-swearing-rushes away, screaming "The jail! The jail!" Prefer-Ing jail to marriage. Balliffs are waiting without to arrest Lady Betty for her debts and take her to the fleet. Lady Fewits-Marie Chambers-arrives after the outraged Ricochet has departed in high dudgeon. Her most intimate friend. Lady Fewits advises Lady Betty how to escape the bailiff and fail. She tells of a certain noble lady who put a wreath of purple flowers in her hair and by means of a jeweled dagger bled to death. "But purple flowers do not become the color of my hair," laments Betty, "and I have no jeweled darger."

Another noble lady, softly says Lady Fewits, jumped into the English channel. "But she was discovered three days later, and, oh dear, they say her appearance was dreadful-dreadful. It was so unfortunate-but then she did not expect to appear before people again." Lady Fewits has suddenly an inspiration-she remembers another lady who, pressed by crediters, went to Newgate prison and married a man who was hanged the following morning. Now at this period, according to law, a husband, on marrying a woman, assumed her debts. By marrying a man to be hanged a noble lady could expeditiously get rid of her debts-and her husband as well.

In Newgate prison, Suggs, the burly jailer, capitally enacted by Percy D. Standing, proposes to Jock Rumple, who is condemned to be hanged the following morning, that he thus help a lady out of a dilemma by marrying her, For this little service he will receive such compensation as will enable Suggs to enjoy a tip and buy a coffin in which to bury Jock. Lady Betty and her friend, having cluded the bailiffs, have arrived at the prison, and beholding ladies, though masked, so fair, the gallant prisoner consents to the ceremony.

Newgate jail is about to be burned by incendiaries. Sir Ricochet, informed of the plot by Terram-Tyke, solicitor for the condemned Jock, arrives at the fail just after Lady Betty has been married. Learning of the marriage, importuned by the solicitor, Sir Ricochet revenges his rejection by pardoning Lady Retty's unknown husband.

Five months later Lady Betty, relieved of her debts by her Aunt Mab, believing that her jail-husband was hanged, falls in love with Lord John Derring. Lord Tierring, madly in love with Lady Retty, is withheld from marriage for awhile by a terrible memory—that of marrying an unknown woman when, under another name, he was condemned to death in Newgate. Aiready married and not realizing it, Lady Retty and Lord Derring are plunged into a complex situation full of alternating high humor and whimsteal distress. Knowing more than the two unhappy lovers, the audience, of course, sees the sun shining behind the clouds and is not harrowed by the wild panie of Lord the truth is brought to light and the wedded lovers fall into one another's arms, is handled with adroft technical skill. The last act ends with an epilogue, in which each actor speaks a "piece" and draws a little moral. While this may prove "above the heads" of many, it

FLASHES FROM "STARS"

Nan Campbell, who in three years has risen to the position of leading woman, has left the stage to become the bride of a lawyer widely known in New York, William Wilson Miller, senior member of the firm of Hornblower, Miller, Potter & Earle. Announcement was made last Saturday by Miss Campbell's mother, Mrs. William Arthur Campbell, of 200 West 58th street.

Mrs. Campbell and her daughter came to New York from Virginia about four years ago to enable her daughter to realize her ambition for a stage career. After a course in a dramatic school, Miss Campbell made her debut in "The Bridal Path." She subsequently played leading roles in "Marrying Money," "When Claudia Smiles" and in "Step Lively" on tour. Miss Campbell's last appearance was in Philadelphia as leading woman with "Drugged."

While appearing as one of the flower girls in "Parsifal" Mr. Savage selected her for the prima donna role of the "Sultan of Sulu," in which she appeared for two seasons
