Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas P Hunter Married to Doctor Davis in Haverford Home-Other Brides.

The wedding of Miss Izora Venetta Hunter, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas P. Hunter, and Dr. J. Leslie Davis will take place tonight, at 6:30 o'clock, at the home of the bride's parents, Coolkenny, Haverford.

The ceremony will be performed at one end of the drawing room, beneath a hower of Australian ferns, with a background of Farleyence ferns and orchids, which is flanked on either side by tall vases of pink roses. The whole bower is topped with a canopy of asparagus vines showered with orchids.

A white prie-dieu, almost concealed by Illies of the valley and orchids, will be used by the bride and bridegroom. Leading to the bower is an aisle formed by white standards holding clusters of white chrysanthemums, and connected by streamers of white ribbon. The stairway leading from the upper floor, down which the bridal party will pass, is elaborately decorated with ferns and pink flowers. A series of floral arches over the stairways and doors leading into the halls are formed by orchids and pink flowers intertwined with asparagus

The orchestra will be concealed by a bank of palms and huge forms in one corner of the parlor. Two large pavilions have been erected on the terrace, which are connected with the house by a passageway, and the grounds surrounding the house are to be brilliantly lighted by lanterns and myriad electric lights.

Miss Hunter will be given in marriage by her father. She will wear a gown of heavy faille silk, made in Empire style, with an overdress of fine net embroidered in seed pearls, and held in by a Grecian girdle of the same pearls. The gown is made with an extremely long court train of faille silk, which is covered with wonderful silk thread embroidery. Her veil will be of tulle, edged with point lace, and will be arranged in a cap effect to form a sort of diadem. Orange blossoms will attach the veil to the train. Miss Hunter will carry an arm bouquet of white orchids and lilles of the valley, interspersed with lace, arranged to form a

The maid of honor, Miss Edith W. Walz, will wear a white frock, which will have a long flaring tunic embroidered in silver and tiny pink roses. The tunic will be edged with silver thread maline lace. The bodice is extremely sheer and lacy, and the whole is finished by a girdle of pastel shades of pink and blue. The bridesmaids, Miss Leonora P. Walz and Miss Gladys W. Trinkle, will wear pink and blue tulle gowns over underdresses of taffeta faille. They will carry pink and blue garden staff baskets filled with roses. These gowns will be of the 1830 period. The skirts are formed of graduated ruffles of tulle. The little flower girls, Miss Ruth Virginia Betts and Miss Elizabeth Conover, will wear lingerie frocks, trimmed with valenciennes lace and pink and blue

Mrs. Hunter, mother of the bride, will wear an imported gown of white satin, with a handsomely embroidered overdress, veiled in black

"OWEN DAVIS MELODRAMA" ON HOR-R-RORS OF RUSSIA

Florence Reed Displays an Art Worthier Than Its Vehicle in Michael Morton's

Play, "The Yellow Ticket." Russia is a terrible country. Ter-r-rible! Poor girls have a frightful time there. They are sometimes compelled to commit murder. Then they become heroines. Powerful Russians are villains of the deepest dye. Therefore, they give "poor gir-r-ris" the opportunity of leaping into the pages of fiction or the acts of the drama. Fine stuff! Sylvanus Cobb, whose name, alas! is forgotten, wrote thrilling tales of pirates that never existed and Russian despots that should have actually lived, inasmuch as they would have killed Cobb's heroes. and heroines. Sylvanus Cobb did a lot to establish the awful reputation of Russia. Maxim Gorky has only added a touch to the telligence. For the Baron certainly could have had his nick of the glorious garden of girls in Petrograd. 'Tis strange! 'Tis strange, as Harry Fisher would say, these vagaries of the human heart!

The great Andrey loves the girl ousted from the house of the respectable American Seatons. Indeed, he does more. He lures the girl to his own luxurious den. Doors locked, champagne bottle open. (Fred Stone calls it "laughing soup.") The Baron offers Marya "laughing soup." But Marya weeps-weeps! Umbrellas,

For Marya is in love with Julian Rolfe, correspondent of American papers. Julian Rolfe is feared and hated by the diabolic despots of Russia. Marya, to save herself from dishoner, plunges a hatpin into the heart of the Baron

"What a death," says Monsleur Zoubatoff. "for a soldier!"

Marya, fleeing from Andrey's apartment, is 'pinched"-yes, sir, pinched-and brought to the Bureau of the "Okrana," the secret police. Gee! These Russians are rude. They refuse Marya a chair. They jerk one from under her as she is about to faint. Then they throw her into a cell. While Marya is in the cell Julian, the journalist, arrives and challenges the Russian autocracy. Jubilant, jejune Julian! You win! f the intervention of the American Ambassador, who is fund of phone calls, Julian is finally allowed to depart-yea, boys!-with Marya. Provided they "never again set foot on Russian soil." Off for the bootblacks! "The Yellow Ticket," while it taxes one's patience, has moments of tensity, and sometimes really thrills. But so do Laura Jean Libbey and Owen Davis. "Drugged," by Davis, blatant as was its melodrama, is a better play than "The Yellow Ticket." "The Yellow Ticket" is more elaborately staged and more consummately acted. Indeed, the acting is so excellent that one regrets that Miss Reed (Marya Varenka), Edwin Arden (Bardon Andrey), Mr. Mawson and others are not in a more serious drama of some intellectual appeal. Miss Reed, indeed, te an actress of rare gifts; perhaps one of the most promising in America. She has the mercurial quality that goes for greatness in the histrionic art. She is as incongruous in melodrama as is John Mason. Let her forsake, for her own sake, such plays as "The Yellow Ticket," by Michael Morton,
