AT THE DANSANTS Milady of Fashion Is to Be Found at the Many Dancing Teas Each Afternoon.

Before the introduction of the universally popular the dansant how did society pass the late afternoons-that period after matinee or orchestra yet before time to dress for dinner? But then that was in the far distant past-mercy! almost two years ago. For the dansant has taken a firm hold on our affections and, many expressions of opinion to the contrary, has come to stay.

The Bellevue-Stratford rose garden has become quite a rendezvous and on Saturdays shortly after 4 o'clock groups of fashionably gowned women saunter in, to be joined later by their husbands, on their way home from the office presumably. Last week quite a number of persons were seen dancing, among them Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Earle White, Mrs. Henry Drinker Riley, Mrs. Charles Brinton, Walter Gilkyson and Frederick Larned, who occupied a table together. Mrs. Brinton looked well in a costume of deep green broadcloth made in the redingote style. The gown had a loose panel of the material running from shoulder to hem and the overskirt was longer on the sides, partially concealing a skirt of green velvet, the latter being used also to form the girdle. Mrs. Brinton's hat was of black velvet with a piping of moire taffeta and upstanding goura eathers. Mrs. Riley wore a smart frock of black velvet
