BILLY LEDGER'S GOSSIP

Young William O. Rowland, of the Recoust Club, better known as "Billy" Rowland, has the proverbial nine-lived feline beaten to a frazzle. His many friends refer to him as the Accident King. He appears to bear a charmed life, judging from the series of surprising raishans he has experienced.

The latest was on Friday night returning from the Wansmaker dance. He and his chum, Mercer Biddle, Jr., were driving at a rapid rate in Mr. Biddle's high-powered car when it skidded sharply and collided with a telegraph pole. The big machine was badly wrecked and Rowland was huried through the windshield, breaking a collar bons as well as one finger and various other minor bruises. Biddle, strangely enough, was unhurt. It appears he landed in a sitting position, and the only thing that was injured was his dignity.

It will be recalled that "Billy" Rowland broke this same collar bone only a few months ago in a collision of automobiles near Atlantia City. He and Biddle were also in the fatal wreck of the Bar Harbor express, which cost the lives of so many prominent young Philadelphians. On that occasion a huge splinter of wood was driven through Rowland's abdomen. He calmly pulled it out himself as he sat on the rallway track, but he was laid up in the hospital for months afterwards. He has been in innumerable lesser catastrophes, mostly connected with automobiles, and one of his friends remarked after hearing of his letest mishap that for such a prosperous individual "Billy" was "broke" more often than any one he knew.

The Wanamaker dance, by the way, I am old, was "some party." The dancers kept at it until 7 o'clock Saturday morning. The society fox trotter nowadays has the original fourfooted article looking like a snall endeavoring to negotiate a piece of sticky fly paper. ....

I had just been shaved and had my shoes polished. Have you ever noticed what a feeling of conscious assurance is derived from the knowledge that one's two extremities are tensorially and sartorially correct? Well, that was the reason, when a radiant vision in the smartest of afternoon frocks stopped me and suggested my accompanying her to a debutante tes, that I surrendered as unconditionally as a hungry soldier.

"But perhaps I wasn't asked," I murmured, still struggling slightly with the conventional strain of a Quaker ancestor. "Who's giving it?" "Oh, it doesn't matter at all," she assured me. 'I don't know them by sight, but everybedy receives cards. All the 'debs' simply take the usual list. There's dancing, too; they won't know you anyway, and I'm sure you did get one." This touching confidence in my obscure respectability settled the matter and we went. The thing that struck me most was the surprisingly large number of men present. I am told the new dances are responsible. "Because it makes the old fellows feel young and the young ones feel old," she explained. It was only the middle-aged, active business men who appeared to be lacking. I saw three bank presidents cavorting across the dance floor, a vice president of one of the country's greatest rallroads and the heads of two large industrial con-

I asked her which type she liked best to play with, "I don't quite know," she replied, "The old men become so awfully silly they bore me with their flatteries, while the boys usually take themselves too seriously. You see, so many of them are still chasing their bluebirds, as Maeterlinck puts it, while those who are not are disgusting."
