TEMPERANCE

TEMPERANCE has received three notable boosts in the last six months, and magazine articles reflect the increasing public interest. The czar's edict banishing all liquor from Russia during the war, which it is rumored may be extended indefinitely after the war, so satisfactory have been the results; Czar Daniels' edict banishing all liquor from the American navy, and the recent congressional vote on a constitutional prohibition amendment, are all national issues which have attracted the widest attention.

Our matter-of-fact acceptance of total abstinence in the navy last fall makes a notable contrast to the hue and cry raised by the abolition of the army canteen 15 years ago. This last is a far more drastic measure, in that it affects officers as well as men and turns the warships into literal water wagons, whereas the army can always find solace in saloons on the edge of the reservations. It is only another indication of the tremendous growth of the temperance movement in the last decade.

Summing up the progress of temperance for the Review of Reviews (1), Dr. F. C. Igleheart, of the Anti-Saloon League, writes: "To many persons the most significant moral and political event of a generation was the majority vote given to the national constitutional prohibition bill in the House of Representatives. The proposed amendment calling for nation-wide prohibition failed to receive the required two-thirds majority, but it obtained 197 affirmative votes to 183 cast against it. This was a noteworthy event, since it marked the highest point yet reached in this country in the long crusade against the sale of liquor."

"Sixty years ago nine Northern States went dry in a single year. Most of them lapsed into license, and up to 1907, out of 18 that tried the experiment, only three—Maine, Kansas and North Dakota—retained prohibition. "The majority vote cast by the national lawmakers at Washington in favor of nation-wide prohibition emphasizes the widespread hatred of the saloon. It expresses the rebuke of millions of voters of this country, who believe that there have been persistent interference and corruption of American politics by the brewers and distillers' associations—the first and worst of all trusts."

"Russia, going dry by Imperial proclamation and hostile to drink as a general war measure will hasten the passage of this national law."

Extinguishing the Cocktail

Although the temperance people did not muster the necessary two-thirds vote for carrying the prohibition amendment, they are rather cheered than discouraged by the fact that they did receive a majority vote, and that they are talking with confidence of the time when cocktail and liquor glasses will be exhibited in our museums as extinct curiosities. La Follette's comments (2):

"The defeat of his resolution was expected by Representative Hobson, but the heavy support it received undoubtedly will encourage the dry supporters to try again with the new Congress to obtain adoption of the resolution for submission to the voters of a constitutional amendment under which all traffic in alcoholic beverages would be brought to an end."

There is an interesting analysis of "Why Arizona Went Dry" (3) in The New Republic, by Carleton Parker, which gives a sense of the many complications and interweavings which go to accomplish any political achievement:

"Arizona has about 68,000 voters. The State went dry by about 600. Using the bartenders' union as a basis, the Royal Arizona Association, the passage through the convention of the State Federation of Labor of a 'wet' resolution. This success, however, held a drawback. The local unions around the State, aimed much passion at the resolutions, bolted these convention instructions: "Negroes have always been barred from all but the Mexican saloons, and it is but reasonable that they should hurl themselves into the liquor trenches. One Negro leader said: 'I don't see how I am expected to get patriotic over a place I'm not allowed to go into.' The Negro population, almost to a voter, dug out its hatchets and with joy sharpened them for the new humble and petitioning saloon man. "The Mexican vote, as a large part of the unskilled miners in Arizona are Mexicans and a rough 100 per cent, deport themselves as described. Hence the mine managers and their following were not out laboring night and day to uphold the integrity of the mining camp saloon."

"The 'wets' imported the many times ex-Mayor of the wettest town in the United States, and he cited quotations from the Scriptures which showed that practically all the revered cures of tradition had lived with regard to beverages either a disolute and disorganized life or had spent their literary efforts extolling such existence. The 'drys' met this by a moving picture film, entitled 'Ten Nights in a Barroom,' shown nightly to thousands which portrayed such highly colored and exaggerated activities in the saloon business that people who had never seen a saloon were exceedingly disturbed."

The Widow in Town Topics, who is inclined to take a conservative, if not reactionary, view of matters, is very resentful over the progress of prohibition, which she terms "an interference with personal liberty" (4):

"In Washington, D. C., there are already some silly little laws that interfere with personal liberty. Somebody got through a law that a woman could not have a drink unless she ate something. It did not seem to be the moral of it, but the intoxication of it. "If she ate she would not whoop or howl, cry or laugh, or tomahawk. At first she had to eat 50 cents' worth. But the stomach when decently filled refuses food, whether food means morals or not, so the law of 50 cents was cut to 25 cents."

"At San Antonio, Tex., the law did not say either man or woman, but if you wanted a drink-cocktail or anything else you had to get it yourself at the bar. The waiters would not serve you. This law seemed to hit women particularly, as—as yet—there are mighty few women waiting this sort of refreshment enough to go to a bar and, with a foot on the brass rail, ask for it and drink it. But if you had a man with you he could go to the bar and get it and he could bring it to you. Still there are ways, even in San Antonio. Sometimes when you take your seat you find the cocktail on the table. And on the trains in Texas—if you are going through to San Francisco—you can be served, but at some stations you must be careful that you are not caught with the glass in front of you, some zealous protector of law or graft might be spying through the window and make trouble."

All reports of prohibition in Russia and its results seem to be highly enthusiastic. An editorial in The Delineator comments (5): "Russia Now Dry—More Prosperous Than Ever Before." So said a headline in the New York World after more than two months of war and of prohibition in Russia. Business in Russia has been hit; Russia was calling young men away from earning money to fighting; but nobody in Russia was drinking vodka, and behold the results:

"The people of Russia have been getting richer. Their total deposits in the savings banks were bigger than on the corresponding day of the previous year. Vodka had been a Government monopoly. It had yielded a revenue of 600,000,000 a year. The Russian Government sacrificed all that money, as soon as war was declared in order to make the Russian people fitter to fight. Russia may gain additional territory by the war. Will any such gain do as much for her prosperity and happiness as has been done by the abolition of vodka? We think not."

Hoch der Stein

An opposite point of view, as held in the Continental armies and navies, is summed up by George S. Viorock in The International (6). Their official attitude, as here quoted, is especially interesting as contrasted with the recent action of Secretary Daniels in forcing total abstinence upon our navy, officers and men. Mr. Viorock writes:

"Alcohol has many strong defenders in the German army, who point out that the most glorious victories of the German arms since the days of Frederick were not accomplished by teetotalers. They point to the defeat of the abettors of Turkey by the nonabstinent Bulgarians, and they call attention to the pitiful state of the Chinese army, whose soldiers are addicted to drugs, although they abstain from liquor. Freiherr von Gotha, the new Military Governor of Belgium, in his capacity as commanding general, warned Germany of the dangers to the efficiency of her army from teetotalism."

"The Austrian army seems to take a similar point of view. Their Navy Department refused an invitation to send a representative to the Austrian Nonalcohol Congress last year. "In general, as a member of the Ministry of War explained to me, the idea of the German authorities is to provide 'for the greatest possible efficiency with the least possible interference with personal liberty of the individual soldier.' The authorities agree with Professor Schulerburg that 'it is wrong to describe certain articles of food as harmful merely because a minority of weak-willed persons are unable to restrain themselves from excess.'"
