SUPERMEN

BUSINESS has such a broad range of meanings, from the successful or tired business man to the mind-your-own-business woman, that somewhere or other business enters into almost everything. The sciences, the professions, charities and even the arts are all being businessized these days, or at least, they are paying more attention to their business and administrative ends, and with very desirable results.

The popular magazines are printing an increasing number of business articles—stories of shrewd and spectacular business deals, of phenomenal careers, analyses of selling psychology, comment on the business and trust legislation before the country. Not counting the special business publications, there are 14 such articles in the current magazines.

The Business World Department of Current Opinion prints a delightfully human and probable business story (1):

One morning a man with a handful of papers went into a store and said, turning over his papers, "I would like to find out how much stock you have." The boss suddenly became very busy—so busy he could not stop to make a calculation—but volunteered in a very large way, "Well, we have got about $10,000 worth of stock on our shelves." "Yes, and how many solvent debtors have you? How much is owing to you that you consider good?" "About $5000." "Well, how much do you owe?" "Don't owe anything." "Good," said the inquirer, "I'll see you later."

That afternoon he returned to the store, and taking out his papers announced, "I have come to collect your personal property tax." "Well," said the boss, not remembering him, "I suppose you want to find out what property I have got." "Why, no," explained the caller, "I was here this morning and you told me. We assessed you accordingly." The boss was angry and said, "My friend, you haven't treated me right. When you came in this morning I thought you were a Dun or Bradstreet man."

In spite of the severe criticisms and prophecies concerning Mr. Ford, he seems to be making a success of his quixotic wages and at the same time making a good thing out of his business. Although there is much more significance to Mr. Ford's experiment, now that he has given it a year's trial, little attention has been paid to it since the first flash of startled publicity died down. Allan Benson, a New York magazine writer, has just visited the Detroit factory, and describes the prosperity of both firm and employes in glowing terms in Pearson's (2):

Mr. Ford has distributed among his employes in 1914 not the $10,000,000 he set out to give, but $12,000,000. Beginning August 1, each month he took from profits a sum which at the end of 12 months will amount to $18,000,000. This sum is to be rebated pro rata at the end of the year to buyers of Ford cars.

Mr. Ford's profits in 1914 were, nevertheless, precisely what they were in 1913, that is to say, $20,000,000.

Ford's force is precisely what it was before his profit-sharing plan took place. A few men have gone, a few have come, but the changes are inconsequential. It is easier to get a Democratic officeholder to resign than it is to get a Ford employe to quit his job. Eighty-four per cent. of his employes are on the profit-sharing roll.

Twenty-eight minutes from the time the assembling of the automobile began it has reached the end of the platform, and a workman jumps aboard and drives it under its own power down an inclined plane and off into the next shop. Two automobiles are assembled every minute of a 16-hour day. The men work in eight-hour shifts.

Ford's employes are an astounding illustration of the increased efficiency brought about by paying workingmen enough so that they have some heart to go about their tasks. When Ford, in 1913, paid them ordinary wages, they made 165,419 cars. When he began to pad their pay envelopes with bills the same number of men in 1914 made 248,307 cars. Nobody is working so hard that he is inviting nervous prostration. I know, because I went through the plant and saw them at work. I know something about factory work. When I was 16 I worked in a factory. I know what speeding means. The Ford men are not speeding.

Mr. Ford has provided the pay envelope form of incentive. His employes feel that he has something more than a conversational desire to treat them fairly. As a result they are well disposed toward him and try to do their best.

Paternalism in the Ford institution? Why, his plant is saturated with paternalism. But shall I cry down Ford because in a measure he is a despot? Heaven knows he is a good despot. As a manufacturer of the present day he could not well improve conditions in his own factory without resorting to paternalism. Ford has not the power to change economic systems. He cannot give anything to labor as a right. He can only give as a gift—or not at all.

Autocratic? Reeking with it. Right in principle? Absolutely not. Right in practice? Ask the wife.

A Legal Hurry-up Wagon

Describing the newly created Federal Trade Commission, World's Work says (3):

The most important provision of the Trade Commission act is that which declares that unfair methods of competition are unlawful. Whenever the commission has reason to believe that any business is using unfair methods of competition, the commission can issue a complaint, and the offending business will have to show that the complaint is unfounded or the commission will issue an order to stop the methods complained of. An appeal from this order can be taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals. The advantage to business which may be expected is that the commission may promptly order men to desist from unfair practices, whereas the courts must wait until the unfair acts are committed and then punish the perpetrators, even though the unfair acts were committed in all innocence. It is even possible that combinations which might be in danger of violating the Sherman act may be submitted to the commission before they are effected, whereas now the only way to find out whether certain agreements are legal is to risk a fine or imprisonment.

The bright white rays of the spotlight were turned for two solid weeks this month upon our princes of American finance. In "Mr. Morgan Stands Pat," the New Republic (4) says of his conspicuously noncommital attitude:

Roughly speaking, Mr. Morgan represents a form of private property that is obsolete. To almost every question referring to social matters he replied, "I do not know" or "I have no opinion." Questioned as to whether it was fair to refuse employment at unskilled labor to men over 35, he replied that this was a matter of opinion; asked what was his opinion, he replied, "I haven't any."

The clearest lesson of his testimony is that Mr. Morgan has a false conception of himself as a private citizen. He seems unwilling or unable to grasp the fact that the house of Morgan is one of the great facts of American life, an overshadowing public phenomenon which no alert democracy can afford to disregard. It is all very well for him to describe himself as a "banker"; he is more than a banker; he is one of the supreme figures of the modern industrial system.
