TRAYMORE FRIDAY CHATS THREE-DECKERS PAST AND PRESENT

The original three-deckers were wooden battleships like the "Fighting Temeraire." Sails gave way to steam and they were no more, * * * Recently Kipling sang in metaphors the dirge of another "Three-Decker"—the three volume novel which the "Six Best Sellers" had killed. * * Now, with the Traymore, the three-decker appears in a new guise as a triple-deck hotel by the sea. * * * The covered Main Deck of the Traymore could sear two thousand visitors. On the Upper Deck the Kalser and all his Reichstag could find their places in the sun. The Top Deck—high as the Absecon Lighthouse—is a retreat for many small groups where the breeze blew cool during last week's torrid wave. * * The hotel porch is characteristically American. Even big hotels in Europe give you only about six chairs, a bench or two, and the freedom of the grass. The decks of the Traymore offer the advantages of a sea voyage without the discomfort of a rolling ship. They are the most extensive hotel porches in the world.

Traymore entertainment last week: "A Night in Naples" in the staurant; in the Helvedere a repetition of Pere Lunctie's Fariaian Cafe; the Submarine Grill the usual attractions. The Sunday Evening Musicals cluded Technikowsky's "Child Christ's Garden."
