Gail Kane and Bruce McRae in Thrill-Filled Gold Rooster

Feature

By the Photoplay Editor

From time to time the Evening Ledger will print critical reviews of the principal feature films. These re-views will be written by the Photo-play Editor from private screenings and will be printed in advance of each film's appearance at Philadelphia the-atres.

ALTER AND A STREET AND A STREET

The casting of a huge gun, its death dealing explosion on the trial test, scenes in the war zone, a submerged mine in action, the sinking of a private yacht, with tons of water pouring down the com-panionways; a United States battleship brought to the rescue by wireless-these are only a few of the things that so to make the new Gold Rooster film, "Via Wireless," an exciting spectacle.

Other photoplays have had as many novel thrills; others have had just as interesting stories of love and perseverance, villainy and its foiling, dangers and rescues. But Pathe has utilized all these elements with unusual skill and finish.

The casting of the big gun is an ad-mirable example. Outside the red-hot light given off by the molten metal all is black. The few figures necessary to the story are thrown out in silhouette or the story are thrown out in silhouette or stand for a moment visible in the glare. When the big gun is to be "put into oil," it swings out on the crane, a flaming sword that cuts across the story of the attempts to ruin the gun and gives the tale a sharp emphasis. The film is full of bits almost as fine. The testing of the sun and its explosion are well handled. The navy comes in as a business-like part of the story. Views of New York and a submass of a Cabinat meetings bitch "Vie glimpse of a Cabinet meeting hitch "Via Wireless" to reality. There are two of the most beautiful moonlight scenes that have been shown in a long time. The whole film is very much aided by the excellent acting of Gail Kane and Bruce McRae. With the help of some good film moonlight and a beautiful house, they make one of the moonlight scenes into a love passage of singular beauty.

Mr. McRae is always brisk and naturalcomething that too many stagey photoplay actors are not. Miss Kane han physical comeliness the equal of any film actress; and she has an intelligence and an acting technique that are all too rare in the films. Work has been started by Ketcham &
