AN ATLANTIC LINER

Some like to take an ocean voyage as a vacation. The palatial steamships have most of the accommodations of a fine hotel and they have a complete detachment from home troubles. Of course, there is that little contrariety—the inexorable rolling of the ship—which makes one long for the firm earth. * * Now the Traymore, built at the edge of the sea, is like a huge palatial Atlantic liner. The ocean breezes blow over its three decks and in the evenings the brilliancy of the vast marble Exchange far surpasses any salon of a steamer. Indeed, he who desires an ocean voyage could be set to the sea. the brilliancy of the vast marker exchange the surpasses any saron of a steamer. Indeed, he who desires an ocean voyage could hardly do better than come to the Traymore. It has all the advantages of an Atlantic liner without that uneasy, queasy, rolling motion, and, too, without danger from submarines. * * * Steamer rugs and chairs are furnished gratuitously by the hotel.
