There is a great romance about brass buttons and the warriors who wear them; in fact, some of the girls find them quite irresistible. It is therefore not astonishing to hear a charming malden talk about her "lonely soldier" these days and wish he would send her his photograph. That was what I heard at a luncheon recently, and really her cheeks grew pink and her really her checks grew pink and her eyes shone with excitement as she talked about him. The idea is to write to the soldier boys who have no near and dear ones at home to cheer them in the awful hours in the trenches. Philomusian Members Plan to Build Houses for Little Comers From the South

ENTERTAIN BIRDS

CLUBWOMEN TO

Unlike the majority of charitable move ments, the Philomusian Club has decided upon one that will provide homes and even maintenance without any questions, char-acter analysis, psychological examination or any of the other embarrassments so often imposed. The new plan is to be tried out on immigrant birds, who are daily arriving here from the South, and who, being unacquainted with the city, might find it difficult to locate in desirable dwelling sections. As the city does not boast of a broker in birds' homes, and as no lists are published of available abodes, the Philomusian women have de-cided that cozy hungalows, apartment houses, two and three-story dwellings, duplex houses-all miniature counterparts of the homes of humans-will be placed at the disposal of the strangers, and that every inducement in the way of furnishment and service will be placed at their command gratis. Special care has been taken to see that the homes will fit the requirements of every species that arrives. Whether the finch be more fastidious than the thrush or the wren more exacting than the jay, it is certain that all will find something "that just suits" in the vast array of homes being erected in West Philadelphia. No board will govern any of these institutions, there will be no rules or regulations; restrictions of any sort will be unknown in the plan adopted. To further the plan and create more
