Listen, my children, and you shall hear of a tender tale wherein the devotion of one ardent lover for his ladylove is shown true and blue. Be it known that the ladylove in question, though by no means feline herself, hath a great love for the soft and furry puss, and has been known in-between flights of literary genius to drop with great celerity to earth in order to pat the "Puthles," so to speak. Well, said young lover, being also a dutiful son, awoke in the wee sma' hours one day last week, | piano. and perceiving that it had grown cooler in the night bethought himself, perhaps, ft were well to keep the furnace in and thus please his family. So, clad in an evening suit of pale lavender silk, he rose from his little bed and descended tended the furnace and turned to mount the steps, when there before his eyes ant the most beautiful coal black "Puthy" washing her face with dainty nicety. Instantly young Lothario thought of his ladylove. Here was a pussy after her own heart, so clean and smooth and satiny was she. So he made a flying leap and snatched Puss up in the middle of her ablutions. Upstairs he fied to put Miss Puss carefully in his goom until he could convey her to the home of his beloved. But, alas! the tale hath a sad ending. As he reached the top step a voice accosted him: "Wha' yo' all doin' wif ma cat? Doan you tech nue, will leave shortly for Cumberland, dat cat; she's mine. I done brung her Md., to visit her sister for several weeks. wif me to keep her fum gittin' lost." There stood the wash lady, with horror written upon her countenance, and dashed were his fond hopes. Never mind, I hear she is going to have one,
