upon a time there was a little boy (Mister Printer: I like to begin a cory like this, but if it does not please you, leave it out). Once upon a time there was a little boy and the little boy loved to fish, he did, and after school and on Saturdays he used to go to a little pool just the other side of Jumpin' Moses (Mister Printer: Jumpin' Moses is a place on the Holston giver, which runs into the Tennessee. I fell in one winter's day at Cold Spring, fast this side of Jumpin' Moses, but you needn't put this in).

Let's see, where is the little boy now? Oh, yes He's going fishing. Well, the little boy used to take a bent pin and some worms which he got from under the stones, back of the barn (Mister Printer: You can buy worms in the sporting goods stores, but they are not so good). The little boy is now fishing with his bent pin. Along comes a man with high rubber boots and a beautiful fishing line. Zip!

The small boy pulls out a wonderful trout and the man's eyes get as big as The little boy puts another worm on the bent pin and-ZIP! Another trout comes out of the water in a few minutes. The man with the high boots and the wonderful fishing line looks at the boy and says: "How do you do it?" The little boy has a far-away look in his eye. Above, the clouds float over the river and away toward the Smoky Mountains. The water in the pool gurgles, twists and twines. Toward the small boy and the man the notes of the turtle dove float on the summer nir. The little boy sighs. A strange look comes in his eye as he looks up at the man and answers:

m "Glad of It." Miss Watson became well fixed as a type actress on account of possessing a waspish tongue. Her next part was that of Mrs Brown in "The Dictator," with William Collier. Mr. Collier, having seen her in "Glad of It" with a red wig. insisted that she wear it in "The Dictator," although she pleaded with him to spare her the Mrs. Carter appendage. This Mrs. Brown was a bride with a barbed-wire tongue. Then she played with Margaret Anglin, in "Zira," the role of a heartless, devilish-minded female.

By this time Miss Watson decided that she had had enough of this sort of thing, and so she was cast by Clyde Fitch for a sweet, delightful little person in Ethel Barrymore's revival of "High Jinks." Then, having demonstrated that she could do something else than use carbolic languages, she accepted the role of a scheming villalness in "Her Sister." In "Vera, the VAN & SCHENCK
