SCENARIO DEPARTMENT

LESSON 9 (Continued)—"Punch"

The Evening Ledger's Daily Scenario Lessons began June 8. They will be followed by a series of scenarios to be prepared by Philadelphia writers...

By HARRY O. ROYD Head of the Metro Scenario Staff

WHAT we call "punch" must not be confused with the overt act. It is the result of sustained suspense...

We have been talking of melodramatic "punches," but all punches are not melodramatic. The suspense for a comedy or for a simple drama is worked up...

In the comedy the suspense culminates in the punch at the very close of the picture. There may be many points of culmination...

A woman of very expensive tastes keeps her husband "broke." He borrows money to keep her in luxuries and finally is unable to get another penny...

Then he proposes to give his wife a scare by pretending to be a thief. She hides the money from him telling her that he is unable to supply her with the funds she wants...

Meanwhile she sees the wife selling everything that she owns. Here the element of suspense begins to take form...

At last the 30 days come to an end and the husband returns home. Friend wife greets her husband as she would a ghost...

The comedy "punch" must be just as sure and just as effective as the melodramatic "punch," showing a gun-fight, with the death of the villain.

Business stories, as a rule, offer little of interest to the public. There is slight opportunity for suspense...

The stock exchange excitement was a novelty for a while, because few people have witnessed a wild day on "change."

If Jones says, "I am going to ruin Brown and bring him to my feet because he stole the woman I love..."
