Police Court Chronicles Desperate soldiers were using each other Desperate soldiers were using each other as pincushions. Valiant generals dashed onward in the face of shot and shell. Zeppelina and aeroplanes collided hun-dreds of feet above the earth. The audience in a Market street "movie" theatre was thrilled beyond words. Then a rumbling noise was heard, as then a subling noise was heard, as though a mighty cannon was being dragged on the floor of the theatre. Was this part of the picture? For a moment many expected to hear the actual fring of a hig gun, believing it was purt of the realizer. And just then there was a crash of giase. Furthermore, it was real giase; the kind that asserts itself, especially if you tread on it with an unsuspecting bars fool. There was a flurry of white in the alr. For the flash of a moment it looked like smoke. But it wasn't; it was milk, and very milky milk at that.

very milky milk at that. It splattered itself about many of those present, and dampened and dotted the dresses of many delirious dameels. It also flowed in many directions at the same moment like a river having dissen-sions with itself. No one viewed the disaster with more horror than a dark-complexioned youth with very emphatic cychrows, who sat near the middle of the house.

He alone knew who was responsible for the commotion.

For the bottle had fallen from the pocket of his raincoat as he took it off to sit beside the fair creature who accompanied him. He appeared to be as much amazed as the others, but it must be said in all

It dawned upon him like a flash that some one at the office had put the milk "bomb" in his coat. His feigned surprise, however, did not deceive the usher near him. He had seen the bottle fail near the seat of him with the eyebrows, and the unhappy youth, to-gether with his sweethcart, was ordered outside the theatre.
